QUINTUS TURIUS, who was an African merchant of great probity, as well as of an honourable family, A. U. 709. is lately dead. He has appointed Cneius Saturninus, Sextus Aufidius, and Caius Anneius, together with Quintus Considius Gallus, Lucius Serrilius Posthumus, and Caius Rubellius, all of them men of the same worthy character as himself, his joint heirs. I find you have already treated them in so generous a manner, that they have more occasion for my acknowledgments to you than my recommendation; and, indeed, the favours they gratefully profess to have received from your hands, are more considerable than I should have ventured, perhaps, to request. Nevertheless, as I perfectly well know the regard you pay to my recommendation, I will take courage, and entreat you to add to those services which you have already, without my solicitation, so liberally conferred upon them. But what I am particularly to desire is, that you would not suffer Eros Turius, the testator's freedman, to continue to embezzle his late patron's effects. In every other instance, also, I recommend their interest to your protection, assuring you that you will receive much satisfaction from the regard and attachment of these my illustrious friends. Again and again, therefore, I very earnestly recommend them to your good offices. Farewell.

<sup>1</sup> It is impossible, perhaps, to determine, precisely, wherein the impropriety of this expression consisted, as it does not appear from the original whether Tiro spoke of his own health or of Cicero's. In the translation, however, it is applied to the latter, as it seems to render the expression less critically just. For as Tiro was Cicero's slave, the care of his health was a duty which the former owed to the latter, as a necessary means of enabling him to perform those services to which Cicero had a right. Accordingly, therefore, to our author's own remark concerning the literal use of the word Adelus, Tiro might very properly have applied it in the sense here mentioned. But there was no such duty owing from the master to the

To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

WHEN our friend Lupus arrived with your despatches, I had retired from Rome<sup>a</sup> to a place A. U. 709. where I thought I could be most secure from danger. For this reason, notwithstanding he took care that your letter<sup>a</sup> should be delivered into my hands, and continued some days in the city, yet he returned without receiving my answer. However, I came back hither on the 9th of this month<sup>b</sup>, when I immediately, as my first and principal concern, paid a visit to Pansa<sup>c</sup>, from whom I had the satisfaction of hearing such an account of you as was most agreeable to my wishes. As you wanted not any exhortations to engage you in the noblest enterprise<sup>d</sup> that stands recorded in history, so I am persuaded they are altogether unnecessary in the present conjuncture. It may not be improper, nevertheless, just to intimate that the whole expectations of the Roman people, and all their hopes of liberty, are entirely fixed upon you. If you constantly bear in mind (what I well know is ever in your thoughts) the glorious part you have already achieved, most undoubtedly you can never forget how much there still remains for you to perform. In fact, should that man to whom I always declared myself a friend, till he openly and forwardly took up arms against the republic; should Antony possess himself of your province<sup>e</sup>, I see not the least possibility of our preservation. I join my earnest intercessions, therefore, with those of the whole republic, that you would finish what you have so happily begun, and deliver us forever from the tyranny of a despotic government. This patriot task belongs particularly to yourself; and Rome, or, to speak more properly, every nation throughout the world, not only expects, but requires their deliverance at your hands. But I am sensible (as I have already said) that you need no exhortations to animate you for this purpose. I will spare my admonitions, therefore, and rather assure you (what, indeed, is more properly my part) that my most zealous and active services shall always be exerted for your interest. Be well persuaded, then, that, not only for the sake of the republic, which is dearer to me than my life, but from my particular regard likewise to yourself, I shall omit no opportunity of forwarding your glorious designs, and of promoting those honours you so justly deserve. Farewell.

slave; and, consequently, Tiro could not, in strict propriety, have applied it to Cicero.

LETTER XXXII.

To Cornificius.

There is no man that cultivates my friendship with greater marks of esteem than Sextus Aufidius; nor is there any of equestrian rank who bears a more distinguished character. The strictness of his morals is so happily tempered with the sweetness of his disposition, that he unites the severest virtue with the easiest and most engaging address. I recommend his affairs in Africa to you, with the utmost warmth and sincerity of my heart. You will extremely oblige me, therefore, by showing him that you pay the highest regard to my recommendation; and I very earnestly request you, my dear Cornificius, to comply with my request. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIII.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul-elect.

ARCUS SEIUS has, I suppose, informed you my sentiments were at the conference which Lupus held at my house with Libo, your relation Servilius, and myself; as he was not during the consultation. And, though I immediately followed him, he can give an account of all that passed after Seius set grand and capital point, which I could wish to be well convinced of, and ever to bear in mind, is, that in acting for the security of our liberties, you ought, by no means, to wait the sanction of the senate; as that assembly is not sufficiently free and uncontrolled in its deliberations.

To conduct yourself by a contrary principle would be to condemn the first glorious steps for the deliverance of the commonwealth, which were so much the more illustrious, as they were unsupported by the formal suffrage of the people. It would be to declare, that the orders of young Caesar are rash and ill-considered, in the same unauthorised manner, taken the important cause of the commonwealth. In a word, it would be to show the world that you thought those brave and worthy fellow-soldiers, together with the martial legions, had judged and acted the principal intent of this consultation seems to have been to determine, whether Decimus Brutus should venture to express the sanction of the senate, to act against Antony, who was, at this time, on his march towards Brutus of Cisalpine Gaul.

Antony set out for Brundisium, in order to meet which were returning from Macedonia, as has been in the 27th letter of this book, Octavius went to veteran soldiers to whom Caesar had granted Campania. From these he drew together, in person, and by his private authority, a very great body of troops to oppose Antony, if he had attempted to have made any attempts upon Rome and the Italian legions.—Phil. ii. 2, 12; Ad Att.

The legions were originally named according to the provinces in which they were raised, as the first, the second, &c. as those legions which were occasionally sent to different provinces, were distinguished, likewise, in order, it was usual to add to this numeral another name for the sake of avoiding confusion. This distinction was generally taken either from irrationally, in deeming their consul an enemy to his country, and consecrating their arms to the service of the republic. To pursue measures which are agreeable to the general sense of the senate, may be well considered as acting under their express authority; when it is fear alone that restrains them from signifying their approbation in a formal manner. In fine, you can no longer hesitate, whether you should be guided by the principle I am recommending, as you have in two strong instances been governed by it already; first, on the ides of March, and lately when you raised your troops. Upon the whole, then, you ought to be both disposed and prepared to act, not merely as you shall be commanded, but in such a manner as to render your achievements the subject of universal admiration and applause. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIV.

To the same.

OUR friend Lupus very punctually delivered your commands and your letter to me, the next morning after his arrival in Rome; which was in six days after his leaving Mutina. I cannot but consider you as recommending my own honours to my protection, when you request me to be the guardian of yours; for, be assured, they are equally my concern. It will give me great pleasure, therefore, to find, that you doubt not of my promoting them, upon every occasion, to the best of my zeal and judgment. Accordingly, although I had purposed not to appear in the senate before the first of January next, yet the tribunes of the people, having on that very day on which your manifesto was published, issued out a proclamation for a meeting of the senate on the 20th of this month, in order to move that a guard might be appointed for the security of the consuls-elect: my affection towards you, induced me to change my resolution, and I determined to attend. I thought, indeed, it would be a most unpardonable omission, if the senate should be holden without taking notice of your inestimable services to the republic, as it unquestionably would have been if I had not attended; or that I should not be present to support any decree that might happen to be proposed for the advancement of your honours. For this reason, I came early into the senate, and my presence brought together a great number of the members. I will leave it to your other friends, to inform you what I there said to your advantage; as well as of the speech which I afterwards made to the same purpose, in a very numerous assembly of the people<sup>a</sup>. In the mean time, let me entreat you to believe, that I shall most zealously embrace every opportunity of contributing to the increase of those dignities you already possess; and although I am sensible I shall meet with many rivals in my good offices for this purpose, yet I will venture to claim the first rank in that honourable list. Farewell.

LETTER XXXV.

To Cornificius.

I AM waging war here against that most iniquitous of all sanguinary ruffians, my colleague<sup>b</sup>.
A. U. 708. Antony; but by no means, however, upon equal terms; as I have nothing but my tongue to oppose to his arms. He ventured, in a speech which he lately made to the people, to throw out some bitter invectives against you. But his insolence did not pass unchastised; and he shall have still farther reason to remember, against whom it is that he has thus pointed his injurious attacks. But, as your other friends, I imagine, supply you with accounts of our transactions, I should rather inform you what turn affairs are likely to take; and, indeed, it is a point of no very difficult conjecture. The republic labours under a total oppression; her friends are without a leader, and our glorious tyrannicides are dispersed into different and distant quarters. Pansa means well to the commonwealth, and delivers his sentiments with great spirit and freedom. Hirtius recovers but slowly<sup>c</sup>; and, in truth, I know not what to think of him. Our only hope is, that the people at last will be awakened from their lethargy, and act with a spirit, becoming the descendants of their heroic ancestors. For myself, at least, I will never be wanting to my country; and whatever misfortune may attend the commonwealth after I have exerted my best efforts to prevent it, I shall hear it with perfect equanimity. You may depend, likewise, upon my supporting you in your rank and dignities, to the utmost of my power. Accordingly, in an assembly of the senate, which was holden on the 20th of this month<sup>d</sup>, I proposed (among other necessary and important articles, which I carried by a great majority) that the present proconsuls should be continued in their respective governments; and that they should be ordered not to resign them into other hands, than those which the senate should appoint. I made this motion not only as thinking it highly expedient for the interest of the republic, but with a particular view also of preserving you in your provincial command<sup>e</sup>. Let me exhort you, then, for the sake of our country, and let me conjure you by your regard to myself, not to suffer any man to usurp the least part of your authority; but, in every instance, to maintain the dignity of your rank and character, as a possession which nothing can countervail.

To deal with you agreeably to that sincerity which our friendship requires, I must tell you, that all the world would have highly applauded your conduct, if you had complied with my advice in regard to Sempronius. But the affair is now over; and, in itself, indeed, it was a matter of no great importance. It is of the utmost, however, that you should employ, as I hope you will, every possible means to retain your province in its allegiance. I would add more, but your courier presses me to despatch; I must entreat you, therefore, to make my excuses to Cherippus, for not writing to him by this opportunity. Farewell.

LETTER XXXVI.

Quintus Cicero to Tiro.

YOUR letter brought with it a very strong, though silent reproof, for my having thus long omitted writing to you. I could not, indeed, but be sensible how much I had lost by my negligence, when I observed that those points which my brother (from tenderness, perhaps, or haste) had but slightly touched in his letter, were faithfully represented in yours, in all their genuine colours. This was particularly the case, in respect to what you mentioned concerning the consuls elect<sup>f</sup>. I know, indeed, that they are totally sunk in sloth and debauchery: and if they should not recede from the helm, we are in the utmost danger of being irrecoverably lost. I was myself a witness, during a summer's campaign with them in Gaul, that they were guilty of such actions, and within sight, too, of the enemy's camp, as are almost beyond all belief: and I am well persuaded, unless we should be better supported than we are at present, that the scoundrel Antony will gain them over to his party, by admitting them as associates in his licentious pleasures. The truth of it is, the republic must necessarily either throw herself under the protection of the tribunes, or employ some private hand to defend her cause; for as to these noble consuls of ours, one of them is scarce worthy to preside over Cæsena<sup>g</sup>; and I would not trust the other with superintending the paltry hovels of Cosutius<sup>h</sup>.

I hope to be with you towards the latter end of this month. In the mean while, let me repeat <sup>h</sup> Who this person was is unknown. Pique and prejudice seem to have had a considerable hand in the draught which Quintus has here delineated of the two consuls. That Pansa and Hirtius were infected with the fashionable vices of the age, is altogether probable; but that they wanted either spirit or capacity for action is by no means true, as will evidently appear in the farther progress of these letters.

<sup>a</sup> These two speeches are the third and fourth of the Philippics. The senate, amongst other decrees which they passed upon this occasion, approved and ratified the measures which Decimus Brutus had taken in Cisalpine Gaul for the defence of that province.—Phil. iv. 4.

<sup>c</sup> Pansa and Hirtius, as has already been noted, were consuls elect for the approaching year. The latter, about this time, was attacked by a most dangerous sickness; and his health was esteemed of so much importance at this juncture to the commonwealth, that public vows were put up for his recovery.—Phil. vii. 4.

LETTER XXXVII.

After having been in daily and earnest expectation of your couriers, they are at length, to my great satisfaction, arrived, having performed their voyage in forty-six days the time they left you. The joy I received on my dear father's most affectionate letter was shared by the very agreeable one which attended myself. I can no longer repent, therefore, having neglected writing to you; as it has been a means of furnishing me with an ample proof of your good-nature; and it is with much pleasure I find that you admit the apology I made in silence.

The advantageous reports you have heard of my conduct, were perfectly agreeable, my dearest Tiro; your wishes, I can by no means doubt: shall be my constant endeavour to confirm and increase the general good opinion which is existing in my favour. You may venture, with great confidence, to be, what you have promised, the herald of my fame. Indeed, with so much pain and contrition of mind, errors into which my youth and inexperience betrayed me, that I not only look upon my conduct with abhorrence, but cannot bear even to mention it: and I am well convinced that I take a part in the uneasiness which I feel in this circumstance. It is no wonder, therefore, that I be solicitous for the welfare of a person in whose interest and inclination I recommend my wishes, as I have ever been desirous you should take of all the advantages that attend my conduct has formerly given you. Henceforward, be assured, afford you no sink of me with double satisfaction.

Cratippus rather as his son than his son, not only attend his lectures with pleasure, but extremely delighted with the peculiar of his conversation. Accordingly I spend my days in his company, and frequently, most part of the night, as I entreat with me as often as his engagements permit. Since the introduction of this custom, and then unexpectedly steals in upon me when I am at table; and, laying aside the philosopher's dress, enters with great good will all the mirth and pleasantries of our country.

Let me request you, then, to hasten as far as possible, in order to enjoy with his time pursuing his studies at Athens, of Cratippus, one of the most celebrated of the Peripatetic sect. If young Cicero had of his father, his genius, however, seems to have been contemptible; and the present when he was but nineteen years of age, is a case of those who have charged him with a case to a degree of stupidity. See letter 36.

us the society of this most agreeable and excellent man. As to Brutius, I never suffer him to be absent from me a single moment. His company is as entertaining as his conduct is exemplary; and he perfectly well knows how to reconcile mirth and good-humour with the serious disquisitions of philosophy. I have taken a house for him near mine, and assist his narrow fortunes as far as my slender finances will admit<sup>1</sup>.

I have begun to declaim in Greek, under Cassius, as I choose to employ myself in Latin exercises of that kind with Brutius. I live in great familiarity also with those learned and approved friends of Cratippus, whom he brought with him from Mitylene, and pass much of my time likewise with Epicrates, one of the most considerable persons in Athens, together with Leonides, and several others of the same rank and merit. Thus I have given you a general sketch of my life.

As to what you mention concerning Gorgias, notwithstanding that he was of service to me in my oratorical exercises, yet my father's commands were superior to all other considerations: and as he peremptorily wrote to me that I should immediately dismiss him<sup>2</sup>, I have obeyed his injunctions. I would not suffer myself, indeed, to hesitate a moment, lest my reluctance should raise any suspicions in my father to my disadvantage. Besides, I thought it would ill become me to take upon myself to be a judge of the propriety of his orders. I am extremely obliged to you, however, for the friendly advice you give me in this affair.

I very readily admit the excuse you make on account of your want of leisure, perfectly well knowing how much your time is generally engaged. I am extremely glad to hear that you have bought a farm, and wish you much joy of the purchase. But you must not wonder that I deferred my congratulations to this part of my letter; for you will remember it was about the same place in yours that you communicated to me the occasion of them. You have now a retreat from all the fatiguing ceremonies of the city, and are become a Roman of the true old rural kind<sup>3</sup>. I take pleasure in figuring you to myself, in the midst of your country employments, buying your tools of husbandry, dealing out your orders to your bailiff, and carefully treasuring up the fruit-seeds from your dessert. To be serious, I sincerely join with you in regretting that I could not be of service to you upon this occasion. But, be assured, my dear Tiro, I shall not fail to assist you, if ever fortune should put it in my power; especially as I am sensible you made this purchase with a view to my use as well as your own.

I am obliged to your care in executing my commission. I desire you would see that I have a

From the same to Tiro.

THE reasons you assign for the intermission of your letters are perfectly just; but I hope that A. U. 709. these excuses will not very frequently recur. 'Tis true I receive intelligence of public affairs from particular expresses, as well as from general report; and am continually assured, likewise, of my father's affection, by his own hand; yet I always take great pleasure in reading a letter from yourself, be it upon ever so trifling a subject. I hope, therefore, since I am thus earnestly desirous of hearing from you, that you will not, for the future, send me apologies instead of epistles. Farewell.

LETTER I.

I NEGLECT no opportunity (and, indeed, if I did, I should fail in what you have a full right to A. U. 710. expect from me) not only of celebrating your merit, but of promoting those honours it so justly deserves. But I choose you should be informed of my zealous endeavours for this purpose, by the letters of your family, rather than by my hand. Let me employ it in exhorting you to turn all your care and your attention upon the republic. This is an object worthy of your spirit and your talents; as it is agreeable, likewise, to those hopes which you ought to entertain, of still rising in the dignities of your country. But this is a topic I will enlarge upon another time. In the mean while, I will inform you, that the public affairs are totally in suspense; as the commissioners are not yet returned, whom the senate deputed to Antony; not to sue for peace, indeed, but to denounce war, unless he shall immediately pay obedience to the orders with which they are charged<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> These injunctions were, that Antony should instantly quit the siege of Modena, and desist from all hostilities in Gaul. Cicero strongly opposed the sending this deputation, as it was below the dignity of the senate to enter into any sort of treaty with a man whom they had already, in effect, declared a public enemy, as it would have the appearance of fear; and, as the only method of bringing Antony to his duty, would be by an immediate and vigorous prosecution of the war. But these reasons, and others of the same tendency, which Cicero urged with great warmth and eloquence, were over-ruled by the friends of Antony; and it was ordered that Servius Sulpicius, Lucius Plo, and Lucius Philippus, all of them persons of consular rank, should carry this message from the senate to Antony.—Phil. v.

my former spirit, in standing forth as the protector both of the senate and the people: and from the moment I thus declared myself the advocate of liberty, I have not lost the least favourable opportunity for the defence of our common rights. But this, likewise, is an article for which I choose to refer you to the information of others.

It is with all possible warmth and earnestness that I recommend Titus Pinarius to your favour, as one who, not only from a similitude of taste and studies, but as he is possessed also of every amiable virtue, engages my strongest affection. He comes into your province in order to superintend the affairs of Dionysius, who, as he is much, I am sensible, in your esteem, so no man stands higher in mine. Unnecessary, therefore, as I know it to be to recommend his interests to your protection, yet I cannot forbear doing so: and I doubt not of your giving occasion to the very grateful Pinarius of sending me a letter of acknowledgment for your good offices both to himself and to Dionysius. Farewell.

POLLAS sends me word that an opportunity offers of conveying a letter to you; but at present I have A. U. 710. nothing material to write. All public business, indeed, is entirely suspended till we shall hear what success the deputies<sup>c</sup> have met with, from whom we have not yet received any intelligence. I will take this occasion, however, of telling you, that the senate and the people are greatly anxious concerning you, not only as their own preservation depends upon yours, but as they

We are raising troops* in Rome and throughout Italy, if that term may with any propriety be employed, where every man eagerly presses to enter the service,—so warmly are the people actuated with a passion of recovering their liberty and such is their abhorrence of the slavery have thus long sustained!

Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Plancus*.

Just lately received from Furnius† afforded satisfaction, not only upon his own account, but more particularly on yours, as he painted you so strongly to my mind did not but fancy, during the whole conversation that you were actually present. He did to me the heroism you display in the affairs of your province, the equity of administration,—the prudence which dis- every part of your conduct in general,— with what I was by no means indeed a before, the charms of your social and abilities. To this he did not forget to see, the singular generosity which you in your behaviour towards himself. Of these articles I heard with pleasure; last, I am much obliged to you‡.

Friendship I enjoy with your family, my father, commenced somewhat before you and, as the affection which I conceived in from your childhood, so, in your years, it was mutually improved into intimacy. These are considerations which engage me to favour your interests; upon, indeed, as my own. talents has frustrated the opposition of those many envious antagonists who vainly endeavoured to obstruct your way. And now, if you will be influenced by the advice of a man who greatly loves you, and who, from a long connexion with you, has an equal claim to your regard with the oldest of your friends, you will receive all the future honours of your life from the republic in its best and most constitutional form. There was a season, you know (for nothing surely could have escaped your discernment), there was a season‡ when the world thought you too compliant with the prevailing faction of the times; and I should have thought so too if I had imagined that your approbation was to be measured by your submission. But as I knew the sentiments of your heart, I was persuaded you had prudently considered the extent of your power. Public affairs, however, are at present in a far different situation; and you may now freely act in every point as your judgment shall direct. The time is shortly approaching when, in consequence of your present designation, you will enter upon the consular office*,—and you will enter upon it, my friend, in the prime of your years, with the advantage of possessing the noblest and most commanding eloquence, and at a period, too, when there is the utmost scarcity of such illustrious citizens as yourself. Let me conjure you then, by the immortal gods, most earnestly to pursue those measures that will ensure the highest glory to your character. Now there is but one possible method of acting towards the republic with this advantage to your reputation; at least, there is but one in the present conjuncture, as the commonwealth has for so many years* been disturbed by our intestine commotions.

When I write to you in this strain, it is rather in compliance with the dictates of my affection than as supposing that you stand in need either of precepts or admonitions. I am sensible that you are sufficiently supplied with reflections of this nature from the same source whence I derive them myself: it is time, therefore, to put an end to what I designed, not as an ostentation of my wisdom, but merely as an instance of my friendship. I will only add, that you may depend upon the most zealous of my services upon every occasion wherein I shall imagine your credit and character is concerned. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

Plancus to Cicero.

I AM exceedingly obliged to you for your letter‡; a favour for which I am indebted, I perceive, to a. v. 710 the account that Furnius gave of me in the conversation you mention. If I have not written to you sooner, you must impute it to my being informed that you were set out upon your expedition into Greece; and I was not apprised of your return till a very short time before I learned it from your letter. I mention this because I should think myself deserving of the highest reproach if I were intentionally guilty of an omission even in the slightest office of friendship towards you. The intimacy, indeed, which was contracted between you and my father, the early esteem I conceived of your merit, together with those instances of affection I have received from you, supply me with many powerful reasons for not failing in the regards I owe you. Be assured, therefore, my dear Cicero, there is no man whom I am so much disposed to revere as yourself; as, indeed, the great disparity of our ages may well justify me in looking up to you with all the sacred respect of filial veneration. I received your admonitions, therefore, as so many dictates of the most consummate wisdom; at the same time that I considered them as instances, likewise, of your unfeigned sincerity,—for in this respect, I judge of your heart by what I feel in my own. If I had any doubt, then, what measures to pursue, or were inclined to adopt others than those you recommend, I should most certainly be determined by your judgment, or restrained by your advice: but in my present situation can there possibly be an inducement to draw me from those paths you point out? The truth is, that whatever honourable distinctions I have acquired, either by my own industry or by the favours of fortune, though far inferior to what your affection represents them, yet they want no other lustre, perhaps, but that of having been attained with the general approbation of the commonwealth; and this even the most inveterate of my enemies acknowledge. Be assured, then, that the whole of my power, my prudence, and my authority, shall ever be exerted in the service of the republic. As I am no stranger to your sentiments, I am well persuaded that mine would never disagree with yours if I had the happiness of having you so near me as to be able to consult them. But though I cannot enjoy this very desirable advantage, yet I trust you will never have occasion to condemn my conduct.

I am extremely impatient to learn what is transacting in the nearer Gaul<sup>c</sup>, as well as what effect the present month<sup>d</sup> may produce in regard to affairs at Rome. In the mean time, I am earnestly labouring to prevent the people of this province from pursuing the example of their neighbours, by taking advantage of the public disturbances to throw off their allegiance. And should my endeavours be attended with the success they deserve, I doubt not of being approved, not only by every friend of liberty in general, but, what I am most ambitious of, by yourself in particular. Farewell, my dear Cicero, and love me with an equal return of that affection I bear you.

To Planus.

THE duplicate you sent me of your letter<sup>e</sup> was an instance of your obliging care lest I should be disappointed of what I so impatiently wished to receive. The contents afforded me a double satisfaction; and I am at a loss to determine whether the friendship you profess for myself, or the zeal you discover for the republic rendered it most truly acceptable. To speak my own opinion, indeed, the public affections are altogether noble and sublime; but surely there is something more amiably sweet in those of the private kind. Accordingly, that part of your letter where you remind me of the intimacy in which I lived with your father, of the early disposition you found in yourself to love me, together with other passages to the same friendly purpose, filled my heart with the most exquisite pleasure, as the sentiments you profess with regard to the commonwealth raised in me the highest satisfaction: and, to say truth, I was so much the more pleased with the latter, as they were accompanied, at the same time, with the former.

To repeat what I said in the letter to which you have returned so obliging an answer, let me not only exhort, but entreat you, my dear Planus, to exert your utmost powers in the service of the commonwealth. There is nothing that can more contribute to the advancement of your glory; for amongst all human honours, none more certainly is superior to that of deserving well of one's country. Your great good sense and good-nature will suffer me, I know, to speak my sentiments to you with the same freedom that I have hitherto used. Let me again observe then, that the honours you have already acquired, though you could not indeed have attained to them without merit, yet they have principally been owing to fortune, in conjunction with the particular circumstances of the times. But whatever services you shall perform for the republic in this very critical conjuncture, will reflect a lustre upon your character, that will derive all its splendour from yourself alone. It is incredible how odious Antony is become to all sorts of people, except those only of the same dishonest views with himself; but the great hopes and expectations of the republic are fixed upon you and the army you command. Let me conjure you then, in the most solemn manner, not to lose so important an opportunity of establishing yourself in the esteem and favour of your fellow-citizens, or, in other words, of gathering immortal praise. Believe me, it is with all the tenderness of a father that I thus admonish you; that I enter into your interests with as much warmth as if they were my own, and that my exhortations proceed from the real love for the glory of my friend and the welfare of my country. Adieu.

LETTER VII.

To Trebonius<sup>f</sup>.

WOULD to heaven you had invited me to that noble feast which you made on the idea of March; a. v. 710. no remnants, most assuredly, should have been left behind<sup>g</sup>. Whereas the part you unluckily spared gives us so much perplexity, that we find something to regret, even in the godlike service which you and your illustrious associates have lately rendered to the republic. To say the truth, when I reflect that it is owing to the favour of so worthy a man as yourself, that Antony now lives to be our general bane, I am sometimes inclined to be a little angry with you for taking him aside when Cæsar fell<sup>h</sup>, as by this mean you have occasioned more trouble to myself in particular than to all the rest of the whole community. From the very first moment, indeed, that Antony's ignominious departure from Rome<sup>i</sup> had left the senate uncontrolled in its deliberations, I resumed the spirit which you and that inflexible patriot, your father, were wont to esteem and applaud. Accordingly, the tribunes of the people having summoned the senate to meet on the 20th of December, upon other matters, I seized that opportunity of taking the whole state of the republic into consideration<sup>j</sup>; and more by the zeal than the eloquence of my speech, I revived the drooping spirits of that oppressed assembly, and awakened in them all their former vigour. It was owing to the ardour with which I thus contended in the debates of this day, that the people of Rome first conceived a hope of recovering their liberties; and to this great point all my thoughts and all my actions have ever since been perpetually directed. Thus important, however, as my occupations are, I would enter into a full detail of our proceedings, if I did not imagine that public transactions of every kind are transmitted to you by other hands. From them, therefore, you will receive a more particular information, whilst I content myself with giving you a short and general sketch of our present circumstances and situation. I must inform you, then, we have a senate that acts with spirit; but that as to those of consular dignity, part of them

<sup>h</sup> As it had been resolved in a council of the conspirators, that Antony's life should be spared, they did not choose he should be present when they executed their design upon Cæsar, probably lest he should attempt to assist his friend, and by that means occasion them to spill more blood than they intended. For this reason Trebonius held Antony in discourse, at the entrance into the senate, till the rest of the conspirators had finished their work.—Dio, p. 249; Plut. in Vit. Brut.

soldiers that are posted for that purpose, by both parties, in every quarter of the country. Accordingly, if I had not received letters by a ship which lately arrived in this river<sup>1</sup>, I should have been utterly ignorant of what has been transacted in your part of the world. But now that a communication by sea is thus opened between us, I shall frequently, and with great pleasure, embrace the opportunity of corresponding with you.

Believe me, there is no danger of my being influenced by the persuasions of the person you mention<sup>2</sup>. As much as the world abhors him, he is far from being detested to that degree which I know he deserves; and I have so strong an aversion to the man, that I would upon no consideration bear a part in any measures wherein he is concerned<sup>3</sup>. Inclined both by my temper and my studies to be the friend of tranquillity and freedom, I frequently and bitterly lamented our late unhappy civil wars. But, as the formidable enemies which I had among both parties, rendered it altogether unsafe for me to remain neuter, so I would not take up arms on that side where I knew I should be perpetually exposed to the insidious arts of my capital adversary<sup>4</sup>. But though my inclinations were not with the party I joined, my spirit however would not suffer me to stand undistinguished among them: in consequence of which, I was forward to engage in all the dangers of the cause I had espoused. With respect to Cæsar himself, I will confess that I loved him with the highest and most inviolable affection,—and indeed I had reason. For, notwithstanding his acquaintance with me commenced so late as when he was in the height of his power, yet he admitted me into the same share of his friendship, as if I had been in the number of those with whom he had lived in the longest intimacy. Nevertheless, as often as I was at liberty to follow my own sentiments, I endeavoured that my conduct should be such as every honest man must approve; and whenever I was obliged to execute the orders I received, it was in a manner that evidently discovered how much my actions were at variance with my heart. The unjust odium however that I incurred by these unavoidable compliances, might well teach me the true value of liberty, and how wretched a condition it is to live under the government of a despotic power. If any attempts, therefore, are carrying on to reduce us a second time under the dominion of a single person, whoever that single person may be, I declare myself his irreconcilable enemy. The truth is, there is no danger so great that I would not cheerfully hazard for the support of our common liberties. But the consuls have not thought proper to signify to me, either by any decree of the senate, or by their private letters, in what manner I should act

<sup>3</sup> Nothing could be more insincere, it should seem, than these professions, as it is probable that Pollio was at this time determined to join Antony. It is certain, at least, that he did so soon afterwards, and carried with him the troops under his command.—Vell. Pat. ii. 63.

in the present conjuncture. I have received, indeed, only one letter from Pansa since the idea of March: by which he advised me to assure the senate, that I was ready to employ the forces under my command in any service they should require. But this would have been a very imprudent declaration at a time when Lepidus had professed, in his public speeches, as well as in the letters he wrote to all his friends, that he concurred in Antony's measures. For could I possibly, without the consent of the former, find means to subvert my army in their march through his provinces? But, granting that I could have surmounted this difficulty, I must have conquered another and a still greater,—as nothing less than a pair of wings could have rendered it practicable for me to have crossed the Alps, whilst every pass was guarded by the troops of Lepidus. Add to this that I could by no means convey my despatches to Rome, as the couriers were not only exposed in a thousand different places to the danger of being plundered, but were detained, likewise, by the express orders of Lepidus<sup>5</sup>. It is well known, however, that I publicly declared at Corduba, that it was my resolution not to resign this province into any other hands than those which the senate should appoint: not to mention how strenuously I withstood all the applications that were made to me for parting with the thirtieth legion. I could not, indeed, have given it up, without depriving myself of a very considerable strength for the defence of the republic, as there are no troops in the whole world that are animated with a braver or more martial spirit than those of which this legion is composed. Upon the whole, I hope you will do me the justice to believe, in the first place, that I am extremely desirous of preserving the public tranquillity, as there is nothing I more sincerely wish than the safety of all my fellow-citizens; and, in the next place, that I am determined to vindicate my own and my country's rights.

It gives me greater satisfaction than you can well imagine, that you admit my friend into a share of your intimacy. Shall I own, nevertheless, that I cannot think of him as the companion of your walks, and as bearing a part in the pleasure of your conversation, without feeling some emotion of envy! This is a privilege, believe me, which is infinitely value, as you shall most assuredly experience, by my devoting the whole of my time to your company, if ever we should live to see peace restored to the republic.

I am much surprised that you did not mention in your letter whether it would be most satisfactory to the senate that I should remain in this province or march into Italy. If I were to consider only my own ease and safety, I should certainly continue here; but as, in the present conjuncture the republic has more occasion for legions than for provinces, (especially as the loss of the last may with great ease be recovered,) I have determined to move towards Italy with my troops. The rest, I refer you to the letter I have written Pansa, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you. Farewell.

LETTER XII.

To Caius Cassius.

You will receive a full account of the present situation of affairs from Tidius Strabo, a person of great merit, and extremely well-affected to the republic. Need I add how strong is attachment likewise is to yourself, when it thus idently appears by his leaving his family and his riches in order to follow you? For the same reason I forbear to solicit your good offices in my behalf, as I am persuaded you will think his coming to you a sufficient recommendation to your aid.

If any misfortune should attend our arms, be assured that the friends of the republic have no other resource left than in you and Marcus Brutus. It is at this juncture indeed in the most imminent danger: as it is with great difficulty that Brutus still holds out at Mutina. However, if he should be speedily relieved, we may look for a victory as our own; if not, let me repeat it to every friend of liberty will fly for refuge to us and to you. May you stand ready, then, all that spirit which is necessary for the full complete deliverance of our distressed country! Adieu.

LETTER XIII.

To Plancus.

I account that Furnius gave us of your disaffection towards the republic, afforded the highest satisfaction both to the senate and the people. But your letter, which was afterwards read in the senate, seemed by no means to tally with those sentiments our friend had thus stated you as entertaining. At the very time when your illustrious colleague is sustaining from the lawless crew of the most worthless you do not scruple to advise us to peace. Peace is their sincere desire, let them immediately down their arms, and sue for it in a manner, otherwise they must expect to be treated, not by treaty, be assured, but by the sword. But I leave it to Furnius and your brother, to acquaint you with the reception of our letter upon this subject, as well as that is, met with from the senate. Meanwhile, as you are well qualified to be your own adviser, and that it will soon be in your power to have recourse to the faithful and friendly aid of Furnius and your brother; yet, inasmuch that affection to which you have so many faithful claims, I cannot forbear sending admonitions. Believe me, then, my dear friend, whatever honours you have hitherto (and you have acquired in truth the highest) they will be considered as so many vain titles, unless you dignify them by joining to them both of the liberties of the people and the authority of the senate. Let me conjure you to separate yourself from those associations whom you have hitherto been united to, indeed, but by the general attraction of party. It has been the fortune of many that will probably be yours, to exercise the magistracy during times of public commotion, not one of this number ever derived that esteem and veneration which naturally flow from the consular dignity, who had not distinguished his administration by an active and zealous regard for the interests of the commonwealth. To this end it is necessary that you renounce the society of those impious citizens, whose principles are far different from your own; that you show yourself the friend, the guide, and the protector of all those who are faithfully attached to our constitution; and in fine that you be well persuaded that the re-establishment of the public tranquillity consists, not merely in laying down our arms, but in being secure from all reasonable apprehension of their ever being resumed to enslave us again. Thus to think and thus to act, will render your character, both as a consul and a consular, most truly illustrious: but if you should steer yourself by other maxims and by other measures, you will possess those exalted distinctions, not only without honour, but with the utmost disgrace.

And now, if I have expressed my sentiments with somewhat more than ordinary seriousness, impute it to the zeal of my affection towards you; assuring yourself, at the same time, that you will, undoubtedly, find my advice is founded on truth, if you make the experiment in a manner worthy of your character. Farewell.

March the 30th.

LETTER XIV.

To Lepidus.

THE singular regard I bear you, renders it greatly my concern that you should be distinguished with the highest dignities of the republic. I cannot, therefore, but regret,

o Marcus Æmilius Lepidus was descended from one of the noblest and most ancient families in Rome, and he was himself distinguished with some of the most honourable posts in the republic. He stood high in the confidence and friendship of Julius Caesar, who, when he was dictator, named him for the master of the horse; when he was consul, in the year 707, declared him his colleague; and who, a short time before his death, appointed him governor of the nearer Spain. One of the most elegant of the Roman historians has represented Lepidus as void of all military virtues, and in every view of his character as altogether unworthy of that high station to which fortune had exalted him. Accordingly he is described by Shakespeare, in the tragedy of Julius Caesar, as — a slight unmeritable man,

Meet to be sent on errands.

But though the poet has been strictly true to history, it may be questioned, perhaps, whether the historian has been equally faithful to truth. For when one considers the great trust which Caesar reposed in Lepidus, his address in prevailing with young Pompey, who had made himself master almost of all Spain, to renounce his conquests; together with the share he had in forming that celebrated league between Antony, Octavius, and himself, which gave him a third part in the division of the whole Roman dominions; is it credible that his talents were destitute of lustre? History, perhaps, may be more reasonably relied upon in what it has delivered concerning his moral character; and it is probable that Lepidus was strongly infected with avarice, ambition, and vanity. This at least is certain, that he acted towards the senate in the present conjuncture with great dissimulation and treachery. At the time when this letter was written, he was at the head of a very considerable army in the Narbonensian Gaul, which Caesar had annexed to the province of Spain, in favour of Lepidus.—Pigh. Annal. li. 451; Vell. Pat. li. 63, 80; Dio, xlv. 375.

I am glad you are desirous of composing those unhappy dissensions that destroy the tranquillity of our country: and if you can effect this good work, consistently with the enjoyment of our liberties, it will be greatly to your own credit, as well as to the advantage of the commonwealth. But if the peace you propose is to re-establish a most oppressive tyranny, be well assured there is not a man in his senses who will not rather renounce his life than thus suffer himself to be made a slave. I should think, therefore, that your wisest way would be to avoid engaging as the mediator of a peace which is neither approved by the senate or the people, nor indeed by any lover of his country in the whole republic. But as this is a truth which you will undoubtedly learn from others, I will only add, that I hope you will consider, with your usual prudence, in what manner it will be best and most advisable for you to act. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Caius Cassius.

I WILL not tell you with how much zeal I lately stood forth, both in the senate and before the A. U. 710. people, an advocate for the advancement of your honours<sup>q</sup>; as it is a circumstance which I had rather you should learn from the letters of your family, than from my own hand. I should easily have carried my point in the former, if I had not met with a strenuous opposition from Pansa. Nevertheless, after having enforced my sentiments in the senate, I made a speech, to the same purpose, in an assembly of the people; to which I was introduced by Marcus Servilius, the tribune. I urged upon this occasion (and with a warmth and vehemence suitable to a popular audience) all that I most justly might in your favour: and my speech was received with a louder and more universal applause than ever was known before. I hope you will pardon me that I took these steps contrary to the persuasions of your mother-in-law; who was apprehensive they might give offence to Pansa. He did not, indeed, forget to avail himself of these fears: and he assured the people, that even your own family were averse to my making this motion. I was by no means, I confess, governed by their sentiments in the case: as I acted entirely with a view to an interest which I have always endeavoured to promote; the interest I mean of the republic in general, as well

<sup>p</sup> The senate had lately decreed, that the statue of Lepidus should be erected in the forum, with an inscription, in honour of the services he had performed to his country by prevailing with young Pompey to lay down his arms.—Philipp. xvi. 4.

There is one article upon which I very largely expatiated in the senate, as I afterwards repeated it likewise in my speech to the people: and I hope your conduct will fully justify what I then said. I undertook to assure the public, that you would not wait for the sanction of our decrees; but, agreeably to your usual spirit, would, upon your own single authority, take such measures as should appear expedient to you for the defence of the commonwealth. I went even farther, and almost ventured to affirm, that you had already acted in this manner. The truth of it is, although I was not at that time certainly informed either in what part of the world you were, or what number of troops you were furnished with; yet I was confident, I said, that every legion in Asia<sup>r</sup> had submitted to your command, and that you had recovered that province to the republic. I have only to add my wishes, that in every enterprise you shall undertake, you may still rise above yourself with superior glory. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

Plancus to Cicero.

I SHOULD employ this letter in giving you a full explanation of my measures, if I had no other A. U. 710. method of convincing you, that I have in every respect conducted myself towards the republic agreeably to my own promises, and to your persuasions. I have ever been ambitious, indeed, of obtaining your esteem, as well as your friendship: and if I have wished to secure you for my advocate where I have acted wrong, I have been no less desirous of giving you occasion to applaud me for acting right. But I was going to say, that I shorten this letter for two reasons: the first is, because I have entered into an ample detail of everything in my public manifesto<sup>s</sup>; and the next, because you will receive a circumstantial account of all that relates to me from Marcus Varius, a Roman knight, and my particular friend, whom I have directed to wait upon you. In the mean time, let me protest, that it was not without much concern that I saw others anticipate me in the good opinion of the republic: but forbore to declare myself, till I should be in a condition to effect something worthy of those expectations the senate has conceived of me, and of that high office<sup>t</sup> I shall shortly bear. I should should fortune second my endeavours, I hope to render such considerable services to the republic, that not only the present age shall feel the advantage of my assistance, but that it shall be remembered likewise in times to come. Meanwhile, that I may pursue these endeavours with the greater alacrity, let me entreat your suffrage in procuring me those honours which your letter sets before my view as incitements of my patriotism; and your interest for this purpose is equal to my knowledge, to your inclination. Take care of your health, and give me your friendship in as same degree that I sincerely give you mine.

LETTER XVII.

now, Consul elect, to the Consuls, the Prætors, the Tribunes, the Senate, and the Commons of Rome.

When I make any professions with respect to future conduct, I deem it necessary to justify myself to those who may think that I have held the republic too long in suspense among my designs*. For I would by no means imagine that I am atoning for my past error, when, in fact, I am only seizing the favourable opportunity of publicly declaring a position which I have long formed. I was in error, however, that, at a time of such alarm and alarming confusions, a less deliberate avowal of my intentions would have proved most to my own private advantage: as I was sensible that my fellow-citizens had been distinguished with great honours, by a more hasty explanation of their purposes. But as fortune had me in such a situation, that I could not persist in testifying mine without prejudicing use which I could better serve by concealing I was willing to suffer for a season in the opinion of the world; as I preferred the opinion of the public to that of my own reputation. It was the genuine motive of my proceeding—not reasonably, I trust, be questioned. If it be supposed that a man in my circumstances, and of my well-known course of almost hopes too were upon the very being crowned, could be capable either of submitting to the destructive ambition of or impiously cherishing any dangerous of his own? But it required some time, much pains and expense, to render me able to perform those assurances I purposed to the republic, and to every friend of her that I might not approach with mere empty promises to the assistance of my country, but with power of performing an effectual service. And, as the army under my command had long and frequently solicited to revolt, it was easy to persuade them that a moderate offer made by the general voice of the community was far preferable to an infinitely more in any single hand. My next labour was to those many cities which had been last year by largesses and other donations—these were obligations of no validity, they should endeavour to obtain the same from a better and more honourable source. I had still the farther task to prevail upon those who commanded in the neighbouring provinces to join with the more numerous party in association for the defence of our liberties, rather than unite with the other, in hopes of dividing the spoils of it must prove fatal to the whole world. That I was obliged to augment my own forces of my auxiliaries, that I might not be forced to fear, whenever I should think it necessary to the inclination of some about to avow the cause which it was my duty to defend. Now, I shall never be his being to enter the next year on the ashamed to acknowledge, that, in order to bring these several schemes to bear, I submitted, though very unwillingly, indeed, to the mortification of dissembling the intentions I really had, and of counterfeiting those which I certainly had not: as the fate of my colleague had taught me how dangerous it is for a man who means well to his country, to divulge his resolutions ere he is sufficiently prepared to carry them into execution. For this reason it was that I directed my brave and worthy lieutenant, Caius Furnius, to represent to you, more fully than I thought prudent to explain in my despatches, those measures which seemed necessary for the preservation both of this province and of the republic in general, as being the more concealed method of conveying my sentiments to you upon that subject, as well as the safer with respect to myself.

It appears, then, that I have long been secretly attentive to the defence of the commonwealth. But now that, by the bounty of the gods, I am in every respect better prepared for that purpose, I desire to give the world, not only reason to hope well of my intentions, but clear and undoubted proofs of their sincerity.

I have five legions in readiness to march; all of them zealously attached to the republic, and disposed, by my liberalities, to pay an entire obedience to my orders. The same disposition appears in every city throughout this province; and they earnestly vie with each other in giving me the strongest marks of their duty. Accordingly, they have furnished me with as considerable a body of auxiliary forces, both horse and foot, as they could possibly have raised for the support of their own national liberties. As for myself, I am ready either to remain here, in order to protect this province, or to march wheresoever else the republic shall demand my services. I will offer yet another alternative; and either resign my troops and government into any hands that shall be appointed, or draw upon myself the whole weight of the war; if by these means I may be able to establish the tranquillity of my country, or even retard those calamities with which it is threatened.

If, at the time that I am making these declarations, our public disturbances should happily be composed, I shall rejoice in an event so advantageous to the commonwealth, notwithstanding the honour I shall lose by being too late in the tender of my services*. But, on the contrary, if I am early enough in my offers to bear a full part in all the dangers of the war, let me recommend it to every man of justice and candour to vindicate me against the malevolence of those whom envy may prompt to asperse my character.

In my own particular, I desire no greater reward for my services than the satisfaction of having contributed to the security of the republic. But I think myself bound to recommend those brave and worthy men to your especial favour, who, partly in compliance with my persuasion, but much more in confidence of your good faith, would not suffer themselves to be prevailed upon by all the applications that have been made, both to their hopes and their fears, to depart from their duty to the commonwealth.

LETTER XVIII.

To Plancus.

ALTHOUGH I had received a very full account from our friend Furnius of your disposition with regard to the republic, and of the measures you were meditating in its defence, yet the perusal of your letter<sup>1</sup> afforded me a still clearer view into the whole plan of your patriot purposes. Notwithstanding, then, that you should not have an opportunity of executing your projected services, as the fate of the commonwealth, which depends upon a single battle, will probably be decided ere this reaches your hands; yet you have acquired, nevertheless, great and universal applause from what the world has been informed of your general good intentions. Accordingly, had either of the consuls been in Rome<sup>2</sup> when your despatches arrived, the senate would have declared, and in terms I am persuaded extremely to your advantage, the sense it entertains of your zealous and acceptable preparations in their cause. The proper season, however, for your being rewarded with honours of this kind, is, in my opinion at least, so far from being elapsed, that, on the contrary, it seems to be scarce fully arrived: as those distinctions alone appear to me to deserve the name of honours that are conferred by our country, not in expectation of services to come, but in just retribution to those that have effectually been performed. Believe me, if any form of government shall subsist amongst us where merit can hope to be distinguished, you will shine out with all the most illustrious dignities it can bestow. But nothing of this kind (let me repeat it again) can justly be called an honour, but what is given, not as the incentive of an occasional service, but as the recompense of a constant and uniform course of patriotism. Be it then your earnest endeavour, my dear Plancus, to acquire these well-merited rewards, by advancing to the relief of your colleague<sup>3</sup>; by improving that wonderful unanimity which appears in every province for the support of the common cause, and by giving all possible succour to your country in general. Be persuaded that I shall always be ready to assist your schemes with my best advice, and to promote your honours with my utmost interest: in a word, that I shall act, upon every occasion wherein you are concerned as one who is most sincerely and most warmly your friend. I am so, indeed, not only from that intercourse of affectionate good offices by which we have been long mutually united, but from the love I bear likewise to my country; in tenderness to which I am more anxious for your life than for my own. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Cornificius.

I AGREE with you in thinking that those who were concerned in the design upon Lilybæum<sup>1</sup> A. U. 710. deserved to have been executed upon the spot. But you spared them, it seems, in the apprehension that the world would condemn you as too freely indulging a vindictive spirit; yet, as well might you have been apprehensive, my friend, that the world would condemn you for acting too agreeably to your patriot character.

I very gladly embrace your overtures of renewing that association with you, for the defence of the republic, in which I was formerly engaged with your father; and I am persuaded it is an association, my dear Cornificius, in which we shall ever be united. It is with much pleasure, likewise, that I find you esteem it unnecessary to send me any ceremonious acknowledgments of my services: formalities, indeed, would ill agree with that intimacy which subsists between us.

If the senate were ever holden in the absence of the consuls, unless upon some very sudden and extraordinary occasion, it would have been more frequently summoned in order to concert proper measures for the support of your authority. But as neither Hirtius nor Pansa is in Rome, no decree can at present be procured, in relation to the several sums of two millions<sup>2</sup>, and of seventy millions<sup>3</sup> of sesterces which you mention. I think, however, that you are sufficiently authorised to raise this money by way of loan, in virtue of that general decree of the senate by which you were confirmed in your government.

I imagine you are informed of the state of our affairs, by those to whom it properly belongs to send you the intelligence. As for myself, I conceive great hopes that things will take a favourable turn. I am not wanting, at least, in my utmost vigilance and efforts for that purpose: and I am resolutely waging war against every foe to the republic. The recovery of our liberties does not seem, indeed, even now, to be a matter of great difficulty: I am sure it would have been perfectly easy, if some persons had acted in the manner they ought. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Plancus.

It is principally for the sake of my country that I ought to rejoice in the very powerful succours with which you have strengthened the A. U. 710. republic, at a juncture when it is well-nigh reduced to the last extremity. I protest, however, by all my hopes of congratulating you on the victorious deliverance of the commonwealth, that a considerable part of the joy which I feel upon this occasion, arises from the share I take in your glory. Great, indeed, is the reputation you have already acquired, and great I am persuaded will be the honours that will hereafter be conferred upon you: for assure yourself, nothing could make sition, which, in some sort, might be considered as injurious to the honour even of Jupiter himself; as it was in the Capitol<sup>1</sup> that the senate, upon this occasion, was assembled. I leave it to your other friends to inform you in what manner I mortified Servilius, and with how much warmth I exposed the contemptible interposition of Titius. But this I will myself assure you, that the senate could not possibly act with greater dignity and spirit, or show a stronger disposition to advance your honours, than it discovered upon this occasion. Nor are you less in favour with the whole city in general: as, indeed, all orders and degrees of men amongst us remarkably concur in the same common zeal for the deliverance of the republic. Persevere then, my friend, in the glorious course upon which you have entered: and let nothing less than immortal fame be the object of your well-directed ambition. Despise the false splendour of all those empty honours that are short-lived, transitory, and perishable. True glory is founded upon virtue alone; which is never so illustriously distinguished as when it displays itself by important services to our country. You have at this time a most favourable opportunity for that purpose; which, as you have already embraced, let it not slip out of your hands till you shall have employed it to full advantage; lest it be said, that you are more obliged to the republic than the republic is obliged to you. As, for my own part, you will always find me ready to contribute to the advancement as well as to the support of your dignities: indeed, it is what I owe not only to our friendship, but to the commonwealth, which is far dearer to me than life itself.

Whilst I was employing my best services for the promotion of your honours, I received great pleasure in observing the prudence and fidelity which Titus Munatius exerted for the same purpose. I had experienced those qualities in him upon other occasions: but the incredible diligence and affection with which he acted for your interest in this affair, showed them to me in a still stronger and more conspicuous point of view. Farewell.

April the 11th.

<sup>1</sup> The Capitol was a temple dedicated to Jupiter, and the most considerable structure of the sacred kind in all Rome. The ruins of this celebrated edifice are still to be seen. None of the commentators have taken notice of the indirect compliment which Cicero here pays to Plancus, which seems, however, to deserve a particular explanation. The Capitol was held in singular veneration, as being built upon the spot which Jupiter was supposed to have chosen for the visible manifestation of his person. In consequence of this popular superstition, both Horace and Virgil often speak of the prosperity and duration of the Capitol as a circumstance upon which the fortune of the whole empire depended:—

—Stet Capitolium

Fulgens, triumphatique possit

Roma ferox dare jura Medis.—Hos. Od. iii. 3, 42.

Dum domus Eni Capitoli immobile saxum

Acolet, imperiumque Pater Romanus habebit.

Æn. ix. 448.

Cicero, therefore, by a very artful piece of flattery, insinuates, that the opposition Servilius made to the honours which the senate intended to have paid to Plancus, was, in effect, an affront to that supreme and guardian divinity in whose temple the transaction passed, as being contrary to the interest of a republic which was distinguished by Jupiter himself with his immediate presence.—Vide Æn. viii. 346.

LETTER XXI.

To Cornificius.

My friendship with Lucius Lamia is well known, I am persuaded, not only to yourself, who are acquainted with all the circumstances of my life, but to every Roman in general. It most conspicuously appeared, indeed, to the whole world, when he was banished by the consul Gabinus<sup>1</sup>, for having, with so remarkable a spirit of freedom and fortitude, risen up in my defence<sup>2</sup>. Our friendship, however, did not commence from that period: it was from an affection of a much earlier date, that he was induced thus generously to expose himself to every danger in my cause. To these his meritorious services, I must add, that there is no man whose company affords me a more true and exquisite entertainment. After what I have thus said, you will think it needless, surely, that I should use much rhetoric in recommending him to your favour. You see the just reason I have for giving him so large a share of my affection: whatever terms, therefore, the strongest friendship can require upon an occasion of this nature, let your imagination supply for me in the present. I will only assure you, that your good offices to the agents, the servants, and the family of Lamia, in every article wherein his affairs in your province shall require them, will be a more acceptable instance of your generosity than any you could confer in my own personal concerns. I am persuaded, indeed, from your great penetration into the characters of men, that without my recommendation you would be perfectly well disposed to give him your best assistance. I must confess, at the same time, I have heard that you suspect him of having signed some decree of the senate injurious to your honour. But I must assure you, in the first place, that he never signed any during the administration of those consuls<sup>3</sup>; and, in the next, that almost all the decrees which were pretended to be passed at that time, were absolutely forged. The truth is, you might just as reasonably suppose I was concerned in that decree to which my name was subscribed, relating to Sempronius; though, in fact, I was then absent from Rome, and complained, I remember, of the injury that had been done me, in a letter which I wrote to you upon the occasion. But not to enter farther into this subject; I most earnestly entreat you, my dear Cornificius, to consider the interest of Lamia, in all respects, as mine, and to let him see that my recommendation has proved of singular advantage to his affairs: assuring yourself that you cannot, in any instance, more effectually oblige me. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

To the same.

CORNIFICIUS delivered your letter to me on the 17th of March, about three weeks, as he told me, after he had received it from your hands.
A. u. 710. The senate did not assemble either on that day or the next: however, on the 9th they met, when I defended your cause in a very full house, and with no unpropitious regards from Minerva<sup>a</sup>. I may with peculiar propriety say so, as the statue of that guardian goddess of Rome, which I formerly erected in the Capitol<sup>b</sup>, and which had lately been thrown down by a high wind, was at the same time decreed to be replaced. Your letter, which Pansa read to the senate, was much approved, and afforded great satisfaction to the whole assembly. It fired them, at the same time, with general indignation against the impudent attempts of the horrid Minotaur, for so I may well call those combined adversaries of yours, Calpurnius and Taurus<sup>c</sup>. It was proposed, therefore, that the censure of the senate should pass upon them; but that motion was overruled by the more merciful Pansa. However, a decree was voted upon this occasion extremely to your honour.

As for my own good offices in your favour, be assured, my dear Cornificius, they have not been wanting from the first moment I conceived a hope of recovering our liberties. Accordingly, when I laid a foundation, for that purpose, on the 26th of December last<sup>d</sup>, while the rest of those who ought to have been equally forward in that work, most timidly hesitating in what manner to act, I had a particular view to the preserving you in your present post; and to this end I prevailed with the senate to agree to my motion concerning the continuance of the proconsuls in their respective provinces. But my zeal in your cause did not terminate here, and I still continued my attack upon that person, who, in contempt of the senate as well as most injuriously to you, had, even while he himself was absent from Rome, procured your government to be allotted to him. My frequent, or, to speak more properly, my incessant remonstrances against his proceedings, forced him, against his inclinations, to enter Rome, where he found himself obliged to relinquish the hope of an honour which he thought himself no less sure than if it had been in his actual possession. It gives me great pleasure that these my just and honest invectives against your adversary, in conjunction with your own exalted merit, have secured you in your government, as I rejoice extremely likewise, in the distinguished honours you have there received.

I very readily admit of your excuse in regard to Sempronius, well knowing that your conduct upon that occasion may justly be imputed to those errors.

<sup>a</sup> It was a sort of proverbial expression among the Romans, when they spoke of any successful undertaking, to say that it was carried on "not without the approval of Minerva."

<sup>c</sup> The Minotaur was a fabulous monster which the poets describe as half man half bull. Cicero, therefore, in allusion to the name of Taurus, who had joined with Calpurnius in some combination against Cornificius, jokingly gives them the appellation of the Minotaur.

which we were all equally liable, whilst we trod the dark and dubious paths of bondage. I myself, deed, the grave inspirer of your counsels, and a firm defender of your dignities, even I, my end, was injudiciously hurried away by my ligation at the times, when, too hastily despairing of liberty, I attempted to retire into Greece. The Etesian winds, like so many patriot citizens, refused to waft me from the commonwealth, whilst Anster, conspiring in their designs, collected whole force, and drove me back again to Rhe-ma. From thence I returned to Rome, with all expedition that sails and oars could speed me, the very next day after my arrival, I showed world that I was the only man, amidst a race of the most abject slaves, that dared to assert his freedom and independency. I inveighed, indeed, at the measures of Antony with so much spirit and indignation, that he lost all manner of patience; painting the whole rage of his bacchanalian at my devoted head, he at first endeavoured in a pretence of assassinating me in the city; but that project not succeeding, his next recourse was to lay wait for my life in private. I extricated myself from his insidious snares, I loved him, all reeking with the fumes of his outrageous intemperance, into the toils of Octavius. An excellent youth drew together a body of men, in the first place, for his own and my par-account of this intended voyage has already been in a former note. See rem. i. p. 551. It seems to allude to his having refused to pay obedience to a summons from Antony, to attend a meeting of the senate which was held on that day. See rem.

vins, as soon as he returned into Italy, after the death of Caesar, endeavoured to secure Cicero in his interest. Cicero appeared no less forward to embrace the party of Octavius. They both of them, indeed, had the strongest of all motives, perhaps, for a mutual alliance; as there is nothing in which men seem to unite so easily, than in hunting down the same common enemy, however, into which Cicero entered with extended no farther at first than to a matter of little controversy; and he only engaged to support in his claim of part of Caesar's estate, which it was alleged, injuriously withheld from him. This was going a greater length than a true friend prudently have ventured: for though the difference between Antony and Octavius, with respect to the question, was altogether personal, yet "by consequence (as the accurate observer upon the epistle of Cicero and Brutus justly remarks) it became a more extensive concern. In the first place, it was with the succession to the name of Caesar, looked upon by the chiefs of the Caesarian party as of the continuance of the public settlement upon the person of Octavius; and, on the other hand, it was always suspected by the more disaffected republicans. In the next place, it gave Octavius particular defence; and in the next, for that of the republic in general; which, if he had not happily raised, Antony, in his return from Brundisium, would have spread desolation, like a wasting pestilence, around the land. What followed I need not add, as I imagine you are well apprised of all that has happened subsequent to that period. To return, then, to what gave occasion to this digression, let me again assure you, that I am perfectly well satisfied with your excuse concerning Sempronius. The truth is, it was impossible to act with any determined steadiness and uniformity in times of such total anarchy and confusion. "But other days," to use an expression of Terence, "are now arrived, and other measures are now required." Come, then, my friend, let us sail forth together, and even take our place at the helm. All the advocates of liberty are embarked in one common bottom; and it is my utmost endeavour to steer them right. May prosperous gales then attend our voyage! But, whatever winds may arise, my best skill, most assuredly, shall not be wanting: and is it in the power of patriotism to be answerable for more? In the mean time, let it be your care to cherish in your breast every generous and exalted sentiment, remembering always that your true glory must ever be inseparably connected with the republic. Farewell.

the plausible occasion of being the distinguished assertor of Caesar's acts, and of the full execution of all his bequests, by which means he drew upon himself the eyes of all the veterans, the military force of the empire, and interested the whole populace of Rome in his cause, since it was the common cause of all who were expecting with impatience the effect of Caesar's liberality." However, had Cicero's engagements with Octavius ended here, his conduct might have been excused, at least, though it certainly could not have been justified. But when he afterwards armed Octavius with the power and the dignities of the state; when he trusted (as the excellent author of the observations on his life ingeniously expresses it) "the last stake of liberty in the hands of a man who had so great temptations to betray it," he seems clearly to have acted in contradiction to the sentiments of his heart, and to have sacrificed the cause of the republic to the hatred he bore to Antony. Plutarch expressly assigns this as Cicero's motive for declaring in favour of Octavius, which, indeed, is abundantly confirmed by his letters to Atticus. It appears from these that there was so little difference, with respect to the republican interest, whether Antony or Octavius was at the head of affairs, that neither Atticus nor Cicero could determine in that view which to prefer:—"Valde tibi assentior," says our author to his friend, "si multum possit Octavianus, multo firmitus acta tyranni comprobatio iri, quam in Telluris: atque id contra Brutum fieri. Sin autem vincitur, vides intolerabilem Antonium, ut quem vellis necitas."—Ad Att. xvi. 14; Plut. in Vit. Brut.; Tunstall's Observ. on the Epist. between Brut. and Cic. p. 139; Observ. on the Life of Cic. p. 60.

LETTER I.

Galba' to Cicero.

ON the 15th of this month, the day on which Pansa intended to join the army of Hirtius, Antony drew out of his lines the second and thirty-fifth legions, together with his own prætorian cohort, and that of Silanus<sup>a</sup>; both which were composed of the Evocati<sup>b</sup>. I happened, at this time, to be in Pansa's army, having been sent a hundred miles express, in order to hasten his march. Antony advanced towards us with these troops, in the supposition that our forces consisted only of four new-raised legions; whereas Hirtius, the better to secure our junction, had taken advantage of the preceding night to reinforce us with the martial legion, which I generally commanded, as also with two prætorian cohorts. These regiments, upon the very first appearance of Antony's cavalry, could by no means be restrained from engaging; so that we were under an absolute necessity of following them to the charge. Antony, in order to deceive us into a belief that none of his legions were with him, had posted them, at Forum Gallorum<sup>c</sup>, and only appeared with his horse and light-armed troops in view. Pansa, when he saw that, contrary to his inclination, the martial legion had rushed on to the attack, gave directions that two of his new-raised legions, which were behind, should immediately come up. As soon as we had passed the woods and a morass, we formed in order of battle with twelve cohorts<sup>d</sup>; the other two legions I just now mentioned not being yet arrived. Antony observing this, drew all his forces out of the village, and instantly began the engagement. Both sides maintained the first onset with the most obstinate bravery; though, indeed, our right wing, in which I commanded eight cohorts of the martial legion, at the very beginning of the action, repulsed Antony's thirty-fifth legion, and pursued them above \**** paces out of the field. But I no sooner observed the enemy's cavalry attempting to surround the wing from which I had advanced, than I endeavoured to rejoin it; ordering, at the same time, my light-armed troops to engage Antony's Moorish horse, lest they should fall upon us in our rear. But whilst I was attempting to regain my post, I found myself in the midst of the enemy's troops, and perceived Antony himself at a small distance behind me.

<sup>a</sup> He had been one of Caesar's lieutenants in Gaul; but not being favoured by him in his pursuit of the consulship, he joined in the conspiracy with Brutus and Cassius. He was great-grandfather to the emperor Galba.—Quartier.

<sup>b</sup> He was military tribune in the army of Lepidus, and by the secret connivance, if not by the express orders, of that general, had conducted a body of troops to the assistance of Antony, in the siege of Modena.—Dio, xlv. p. 336.

Upon this, throwing my shield across my shoulders, I galloped full speed towards one of our new-raised legions, which I saw advancing from the camp; the enemy, at the same time pursuing me on the one side, and our own men aiming their pikes at me on the other; but, as the latter soon discovered who I was, I had the very extraordinary good fortune to escape. Caesar's prætorian cohort<sup>e</sup>, which was posted on the Æmilian road, made a very long and vigorous resistance. But our left wing, in which were two cohorts of the martial legion, together with the prætorian cohort, and which formed indeed the weakest division of our army, began to give ground, being hemmed in by Antony's cavalry, in which he is extremely strong. As soon as all our troops had made good their retreat, I began to think of mine, and was the last that entered our camp. Antony, considering himself as master of the field, imagined he could, likewise, take possession of our camp; but, after an unsuccessful attempt, he retired with great loss.

As soon as Hirtius was informed of what had passed, he put himself at the head of twenty veteran cohorts, and meeting Antony in his return from the attack of our camp, engaged him upon the very spot where our action had just before happened, and entirely defeated his army. About ten o'clock that night, Antony, with his cavalry, regained his camp near Mutina; as Hirtius retired to that which Pansa had quitted in the morning, and in which he had left the two legions that repulsed Antony.

The enemy have lost the greatest part of their veteran troops. But this advantage was not to be obtained without a loss, likewise, on our side; the prætorian cohorts, together with the martial legion, having somewhat suffered in this action. We have taken two legionary standards<sup>f</sup>, together with sixty others; and, upon the whole, have gained a very considerable victory. Farewell.

From the camp, April the 30th.

As I suppose you see very clearly the measures which Pollio will pursue, I need say nothing to you upon that article. But I make it my first and principal request that you would send to Lepidus, in order, if possible, to prevent that light and inconstant man from renewing the war by joining with Antony; as both Lepidus and Pollio are at the head of very numerous and powerful armies. I do not mention this as imagining that you are not equally attentive to these important points,—but from the firm persuasion that Lepidus, however dubious it may perhaps appear to the senate, will never of himself act in the manner he ought. Let me entreat you, likewise, to confirm Plancus in his present resolutions; who, I should hope, when he sees Antony driven out of Italy, will not be wanting in his assistance to the republic. If the latter should have crossed the Alps, I purpose to post a proper number of forces to guard the passes of those mountains<sup>g</sup>; and you may depend upon my giving you regular notice of all my motions. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Plancus.

How pleasing was the letter I received from you two days before our victory at Mutina! wherein A. v. 710. you gave me an account of the state of your troops, of your zeal to the republic, and of the expedition with which you were advancing to the relief of Brutus. But, notwithstanding that the enemy was defeated before you could join our army, the hopes, nevertheless, of the commonwealth are still fixed entirely upon you ; as the principal leaders of these infamous rebels have escaped, it is said, from the field of battle. You will remember, therefore, that to exterminate the remains of this party will be a service no less acceptable to the senate than if you had given them the first repulse.

<sup>g</sup> The intent of this guard seems to have been what Mr. Ross conjectures, in order to intercept the march of Ventidius, and prevent him from following Antony over the Alps.

I am waiting, as well as many others, with great impatience for the return of your couriers. I hope that our late success will now induce even Lepidus himself to act in concert with you for the defence of the common cause. I entreat you, my dear Plancus, to employ your utmost endeavours for this important purpose, that every spark of this horrid war may be utterly and for ever extinguished. If you should be able to effect this, you will render a most godlike service to your country, and at the same time procure immortal honour to yourself. Farewell.

May the 5th.

LETTER V.

To the same.

I SEIZED the very first opportunity of contributing to the augmentation of your dignities ; and I omitted no distinction that could be considered either as the applause or reward of merit. This you will perceive by the decree which has been voted to your honour with the utmost zeal and unanimity in a very full house ; and it is expressed in the very words I dictated from a paper which I had drawn up for that purpose. I was sensible, at the same time, from your letter, that it was more your ambition to approve your actions to every honest mind, than to be distinguished with these ensigns of glory ; but I thought it incumbent upon the republic to consider, not what you desire, but what you deserve. Let me only entreat you to finish the work which others have so happily begun ; remembering that whoever shall destroy Antony will have the whole honour of concluding this war. It is thus that Homer gives the glory, not to Ajax, nor Achilles, but to Ulysses alone, of having exterminated Troy<sup>1</sup>. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

I LOOK upon the obligations I have received from you, as nothing inferior even to those which A. U. 710. I have conferred upon the republic ; but I am not capable, you are well assured, of making you so ill a return as I have experienced from some of my ungrateful countrymen. It might, perhaps, in the present conjuncture, be thought to have somewhat the air of flattery were I to say, that your single applause outweighs, in my esteem, their whole united approbation. It is certain, however, that you view my actions by the faithful light of dispassionate truth and reason ; whereas they, on the contrary, look upon them through the clouds of envy and malevolence. But I am little concerned how much soever they may oppose my honours, provided they do not obstruct me in my services to the republic,—the very dangerous situation of which let me now point out to you in as few words as possible.

In the first place, then, you are sensible what great disturbances the death of the consuls<sup>a</sup> may create in Rome ; as it may give occasion to all the dangerous practices that ambition will suggest to those who are desirous of succeeding to their office<sup>b</sup>. This is all that prudence will allow me to say in a letter ; and all, indeed, that is necessary to be said to a man of your penetration. As to Antony, notwithstanding he made his escape from the field of battle with but a very few troops, and those too entirely disarmed ; yet, by setting open the prisons, and by pressing all sorts of men that fell in his way, he has collected no contemptible number of forces. These have likewise been considerably augmented by the accession of the veteran and other troops of Ventidius ; who, after a very difficult march over the Apennine mountains, has found means to join Antony in the fens of Sabata<sup>c</sup>. The only possible scheme which the latter can pursue is,—either to have recourse to Lepidus, if that general should be disposed to receive him ; or to post himself on the Alps and Apennines, in order to make depredations with his cavalry (in which he is exceedingly strong) on the neighbouring country ; or to march into Etruria<sup>d</sup>, where we have no army to oppose him. Had Cæsar, however, passed the Apennine mountains agreeably to my advice<sup>e</sup>, I should have driven Antony into such difficulties that, perhaps without striking a single blow, I should have been able to have wasted his whole army by famine. But the misfortune is, that Cæsar will neither be governed by me, nor will his army be governed by him,—both which are very unhappy circumstances for our cause. This then being the sad state of public affairs, can I be solicitous, as I said above, what opposition I may meet with in respect to my own personal honours ? The particulars I have here mentioned are of so very delicate a nature, that I know not how you will be able to touch upon them in the senate ; or if you should, I fear it will be to no purpose. In the mean time I am in no condition to subsist my troops any longer. When I first took up arms for the deliverance of the commonwealth, I had above four hundred thousand sestertia<sup>f</sup> in ready money ; but at present I have not only mortgaged every part of my estate, but have borrowed all I could possibly raise on the <sup>e</sup> "Octavius, from the beginning, had no thoughts of pursuing Antony. He had already gained what he aimed at ; had reduced Antony's power so low, and raised his own so high, as to be in a condition of making his own terms with him in the partition of the empire ; whereas, if Antony had been wholly destroyed, the republican party would have probably been too strong for him and Lepidus. When Octavius was pressed, therefore, to pursue Antony, he contrived still to delay it until it was too late, taking himself to be more usefully employed in securing to his interest the troops of the consuls."—Life of Cicero, p. 274.

LETTER VII.

Plancus to Cicero.

HAVE you a thousand and a thousand thanks for your late favours, which, as long as I live, I shall always most gratefully acknowledge. More than this I dare not venture to say; for I fear it will never be in my power to discharge such uncommon obligations, unless you think (what your letter endeavours, indeed, such serious eloquence to persuade me) that I am under an obligation to return them. You could have acted with a more affectionate zeal if the case of your own son had been in question; I am perfectly sensible of the high honours decreed to me in consequence of your opinion for that purpose. I am sensible, too, that your subsequent votes in my behalf were conformable to the circumstances of the case and the opinion of my friends; as I am likewise, of the advantageous colours in which you are perpetually representing me, as well as the frequent contests you sustain with my detractors. It is incumbent upon me, in the first place, to endeavour to contribute to the republic that I am worthy of the praises now upon me,—and, in the next place, to be sensible that I gratefully bear your remembrance. I will only add, under the impression, that I desire you to protect me in the measures I have thus procured by your influence; and I desire no otherwise than as my actions prove that I am the man you wish to find me. As I had passed the Rhone, I detached three thousand horse under the command of my brother, with orders to advance to Mutina, to which place I intended to go with the rest of my army. But, on the 11th, I received advice that an action had been fought and that the siege was raised. I find, has no other resource left but to retire to these parts with the remains of his army. His only hopes, indeed, are, that I am able to gain either Lepidus or his army, and that there are some troops no less disaffected to the republic than those which served under myself. I thought proper, therefore, to recall my cavalry, and to halt in the country of the Allobroges<sup>a</sup>, that I may be ready to act as circumstances shall require. If Antony should retire into this country destitute of men, I make no doubt, notwithstanding, that he should be received by the army of Lepidus, to be able to give a good account of him with my present forces. Should he even appear at the head of some troops, and should the tenth veteran legion revolt, which, together with the rest of those regiments, was by my means prevailed upon to engage in the service of the republic,—yet I shall endeavour, by acting on the defensive, to prevent him from gaining any advantage over us; which I hope to effect, till a reinforcement from Italy shall enable me to exterminate this desperate crew. I will venture at least to assure you, my dear Cicero, that neither zeal nor vigilance shall be wanting on my part for that purpose. It is my sincere wish, indeed, that the senate may have no farther fears; but if any should still remain, no man will enter into their cause with greater warmth and spirit, nor be willing to suffer more in the support of it, than myself.

I am endeavouring to engage Lepidus to join with me in the same views; and I have promised him, if he will act with a regard to the interest of the republic, that I shall, upon all occasions, yield him an entire deference. I have employed my brother, together with Furnius and Laterensis<sup>b</sup>, to negotiate this association between us; and no private injury done to myself shall ever prevent me from concurring with my greatest enemy whenever it may be necessary for the defence of the commonwealth. But should these overtures prove unsuccessful, I shall still persevere with the same zeal (and, perhaps, with more glory) in my endeavours to give satisfaction to the senate. Take care of your health, and allow me an equal return of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

Decimus Brutus, Consul elect, to Cicero.

I HAVE received a duplicate of the letter you sent me by my couriers, to which I can only say, A. U. 710. in return, that my obligations to you rise much higher than I can easily discharge.

I gave you an account, in my last, of the posture of our affairs: since which I have received intelligence that Antony is on his march towards Lepidus. Among some papers of Antony which are fallen into my hands, I found a list of the several persons whom he intended to employ as mediators in his behalf with Pollio, Lepidus, and Plancus; so that he has not yet, it seems, given up all hopes of gaining the latter. Nevertheless, I did not hesitate to send an immediate express to Plancus, with advice of Antony's march. I expect, within a few days, to receive ambassadors from the Allobroges, and all the other districts of this province: and I doubt not of dismissing them strongly confirmed in their allegiance to the republic. You will be attentive on your part, I dare say, to promote all such necessary measures at Rome as shall be agreeable to your sentiments, and to the interest of the commonwealth. I am equally persuaded that you will prevent, if it be possible to prevent, the malevolent schemes of my enemies. But if you should not succeed in these generous endeavours, you will, at least, have the satisfaction to find that no indignities they can throw upon me, are capable of deterring me from my purposes. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

Plancus to Cicero.

SOME occurrences have arisen since I closed my former letter, of which I think it may import the republic that you should be apprised; as both the commonwealth and myself, I hope, have reaped advantage from my assiduity in the affair I am going to mention. I solicited Lepidus by repeated expresses to lay aside all animosities between us, and amicably unite with me in concerting measures for the succour of the republic, conjuring him to prefer the interest of his family and his country to that of a contemptible and desperate rebel; and assuring him, if he did so, that he might entirely command me upon all occasions. Accordingly, by the intervention of Laterensis, I have succeeded in my negotiation; and Lepidus has given me his honour that if he cannot prevent Antony from entering his province<sup>a</sup>, he will most certainly lead his army against him. He requests, likewise, that I would join him with my forces; and the rather, as Antony is extremely strong in cavalry, whereas that of Lepidus is very inconsiderable: and out of these few, ten of his best men have lately deserted to my camp. As soon as I received this express, I lost no time to forward and assist the good intentions of Lepidus. I clearly saw, indeed, the advantage that would arise from my joining him; as my horse would be of service in pursuing and destroying Antony's cavalry, and, as the presence of my troops in general, would be a restraint upon the disaffected part of those under his command. To this end, having spent a day in throwing a bridge across the Isara<sup>b</sup>, a very considerable river, that bounds the territories of the Allobroges, I passed it with my whole army on the 12th of May. But having received advice that Lucius Antonius<sup>c</sup> was advancing towards us with some regiments of horse and foot, and that he was actually arrived at Forum Julii<sup>d</sup>; I ordered, on the 14th, a detachment of four thousand horse to meet him, under the command of my brother, whom I purpose to follow by long marches with four light-armed legions and the remainder of my cavalry. And should that Fortune which presides over the republic prove in any degree favourable to my arms, I shall soon put an end, at once, both to our own fears and to the hopes of these insolent rebels. But if the infamous Antony, apprised of our approach, should retire towards Italy, it will be the business of Brutus to intercept his march; and Brutus, I am persuaded, will not be wanting either in courage or conduct for that purpose. Nevertheless, I shall, in that case, send my brother with a detachment of horse to harass Antony in his retreat, and to protect Italy from his depredations. Farewell.

LETTER X.

Cassius, Proconsul, to Cicero.

YOUR letter<sup>a</sup> affords me a new proof of your extraordinary friendship. I find by it that you are a. u. 710. not only a well-wisher to my interest, (as you have, at all times, been, indeed, for the sake of the republic as well as for my own,) but enter into it with the warmest and most serious solicitude. I was persuaded, therefore, that as you could not suppose me capable of being inactive at a season when my country laboured under a general oppression, you would be impatient to hear both of my personal welfare and of the success of my military preparations. For this reason, as soon as Aulus Allienus had resigned those legions into my hands which he brought from Egypt<sup>b</sup>, I wrote to you by different couriers, whom I despatched to Rome. I sent a letter, at the same time, to the senate; and if my people obeyed their instructions, it was not delivered till it was first read to you. But, if these expresses should not be arrived, I am persuaded they have been intercepted by Dolabella, who, after having most villainously murdered Trebonius<sup>c</sup>, has made himself master of his province.

All the troops which I found in Syria have submitted to my authority. However, I have been a little retarded in my preparations, in order to distribute some donatives which I had promised to the soldiers, but I have now discharged my engagements.

If you are sensible that I have refused no labours nor dangers for the service of my country: if it was by your advice and persuasion that I took up arms against those infamous invaders of our liberties; if I have not only raised an army for the defence of a commonwealth, but have even snatched it from our cruel and oppressive hands; let these considerations recommend my interests to your care and attention. Had Dolabella, indeed, possessed himself of these forces, the expectation of such an additional body of troops, even before they had actually joined Antony, would greatly have consoled and strengthened his party. If, upon this point, therefore, you think these soldiers deserve the aid of the republic, let them experience the fruit of your patronage, nor suffer them to have cause to regret, that they preferred their duty to a commonwealth, to all the powerful temptations of power and rapine. I must also recommend it to your care, that due honours be paid to the ails, Marcus and Crispus<sup>c</sup>. As to Bassus, he lately refused to deliver up the legion under command: and had they not, without his condescending some of their officers to treat with him, he would have shut the gates of Apamea, and not have entered the town by assault. I have these requests, then, as well in the name of friendship, which, I trust, will have much weight with you; as in that of the republic, which, I know, has been the object of your warmest affection. Believe me, the army under my command is zealously attached not only to the senate, every friend of our country, but particularly to yourself. The frequent accounts, indeed, of your patriot disposition, have extremely endeared you to them, and should they find their duty to be a part of your concern, they will be to you, in all respects, as their first and best benefactor.

<sup>c</sup> It has already been observed [see rem. b., p. 567] that Dolabella left Rome before the expiration of his commission, in order to possess himself of the government of Syria. In his way thither he arrived at Smyrna, where Trebonius, proconsul of Asia Minor, resided. Trebonius refused him admittance into the city, but treated him, however, with great civility, and many compliments mutually passed between them. With these Dolabella appeared satisfied, and pretending to pursue his march, proceeded towards Ephesus; but he returned in the night, and making himself master of the city by surprise, seized Trebonius in his bed. Cicero, in one of his Philippics, expatiates upon the cruelties which Dolabella exercised on this his unfortunate but illustrious prisoner. He kept him two days under torture, to extort a discovery of the public money in his custody, insulting him at the same time with the most opprobrious language; he then ordered his head to be cut off and exhibited to the populace on the point of a spear, his body to be dragged through the principal streets of Smyrna, and afterwards to be thrown into the sea. See rem. b., p. 544; Appian. De Bell. Civ. lib. p. 542; Phil. xi. 2, 3.

I wrote the above, I have received intelligence that Dolabella is marched into Cilicia, I purpose immediately to follow him. I thank you for your early notice of the event of this expedition, may I so prove successful, as I shall be able to deserve well of the republic. Take care of your health, and continue your friendship as ever.

My camp, May the 7th.

LETTER XI.

Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

When I saw you commissioned Galba and I to deliver to the senate, sufficiently intimates the nature of those fears and suspicions which you imagine we have entertained. But I must confess, that the news you would thus infuse into us, seems to me worthy of that glorious victory you had over the enemies of the commonwealth. I believe me, my dear Brutus, both the generals that support its cause, are with an undaunted resolution; we are sure, that you, whom we esteem the first citizen that ever the republic employed, are as capable of any timidity. Is it not so, after having confidently reposed your courage and conduct, when you were by Antony in all the fulness of his strength and power, that any of us should harbour the least fear now that the siege is raised, and the enemy's army entirely overthrown? Nor have we anything, surely, to apprehend from Lepidus. For who can imagine him so utterly void of all rational conduct, as to have professed himself an advocate for peace, when we were engaged in a most necessary and important war, and yet to take up arms against the republic the moment that most desirable peace is restored? You are far too sagacious, I doubt not, to entertain such a thought<sup>d</sup>. Nevertheless, the fears you have renewed amongst us, at a time when every temple throughout Rome is resounding with our thanksgivings for your deliverance, have cast a very considerable damp upon our joy. May the fact prove, then, (what, indeed, I am inclined to believe as well as hope) that Antony is completely vanquished. But should he happen to recover some degree of strength, he will most assuredly find that neither the senate is destitute of wisdom nor the people of courage; I will add, too, nor the republic of a general, so long as you shall be alive to lead forth her armies. Farewell.

May the 19th.

LETTER XII.

Planus to Cicero.

ANTONY arrived at Forum-Julii, with the van of his army, on the 15th of May, and Ventidius is only two days' march behind him. Lepidus writes me word, that he proposes to wait for me at Forum-Voconii<sup>e</sup>, where he is at present encamped, a place about four-and-twenty miles distant from Forum-Julii. If he and Fortune do not deceive my expectations, the senate may depend upon my speedily terminating this business to their full satisfaction.

I mentioned to you in a former letter, that the great fatigues which my brother had undergone, by his continual marches, had extremely impaired his constitution. However, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered to get abroad, he considered his health as an acquisition which he had gained as much for the service of the republic as for himself, and was the first therefore to engage in every hazardous expedition. But I have recommended it to him, and indeed insisted, that he should return to Rome, as he would be much more likely to wear himself away by continuing in the camp, than be able to give me any assistance. Besides, I imagined, now that the republic was most unhappily deprived of both the consuls, that the presence of so worthy a magistrate would be absolutely necessary at Rome. But if any of you should think otherwise, let me be censured for my imprudent advice; but let not my brother be condemned as failing in his duty.

Lepidus, agreeably to my request, has delivered Apella into my hands, as a hostage for the faithful execution of his engagements to co-operate with me in the defence of the commonwealth. Lucius Gellius has given me proofs of his zeal, as he has also acted in the affair of the three brothers, to the satisfaction of Sextus Gavianus. I have lately employed the latter in some negotiations between Lepidus and myself, and I have found him firmly attached to the interest of the republic. It is with great pleasure I give this testimony in his favour, a tribute which I shall always be ready to pay wherever it is deserved.

<sup>d</sup> It will appear in the progress of these letters, that if Cicero was really in earnest in what he here says concerning Lepidus, it was he himself, and not Brutus, who wanted sagacity.

Take care of your health, and allow me the same share of your heart which you most assuredly possess of mine. I recommend my dignities, likewise, to your protection; and I hope, if I can plead any merit, you will continue your good offices to me with the same singular affection you have hitherto discovered. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To Cornificius.

You recommend a friend of my own, when you desire my good offices to Luccius: be assured I shall faithfully support his interest by every mean in my power.

We have lost our colleagues, Hirtius and Pansa: and the death of these excellent consuls, who discharged their office with great advantage to the republic, has happened at a very unseasonable conjuncture. For though we are at present delivered from the oppressions of Antony, we are not wholly free from all apprehensions of danger. But, if I may be permitted, I shall continue my usual endeavours to preserve the commonwealth from ruin; though, I must confess, I am full weary of the work. No lassitude, however, ought to obstruct the duties we owe to our country.—But I forbear to enter farther into this subject, as I had rather you should hear of my actions from others than from myself. The account I receive of yours is entirely agreeable to my wishes; but it is far otherwise with respect to the reports concerning Minucius. They are, indeed, very unfavourable to his character, notwithstanding all the fine things you said of him in one of your letters. I should be glad to know the truth of the case, and to be informed of everything else which is transacting in your province. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

It is with infinite satisfaction, my dear Brutus, that I find you approve of my conduct in the senate, with respect both to the decemvirs, and to the honours decreed to our young<sup>a</sup> man. Yet, after all, what have my labours availed? Believe me, my friend, (and you know I am not apt to boast,) the senate was the grand engine of my power: but all those springs which I used so successfully to manage, have utterly lost their force, and I can no longer direct its motions. The truth of it is, the news of your glorious sally from the garrison of Mutina, of Antony's flight, and of his army being entirely cut to pieces, had inspired such confident hopes of a complete victory, that the disappointment has cast a general damp upon the spirit I had raised against our enemies; and all my ardent invectives seem at last to have proved just as insignificant as if I had been combating with my own shadow. But to the purpose of your letter.—Those who are acquainted with the dispositions of the fourth and the marialis legions, assure me they will never be prevailed on to serve under you. As to the supply of money which you desire, some measures may, and most assuredly shall, be taken in order to raise it. I am wholly in your sentiments with regard to the calling Brutus out of Greece, and retaining Cæsar here for the protection of Italy. I agree with you, likewise, my dear Brutus, that you have enemies; and though I find it no very difficult matter to sustain their attacks, yet still, however, they somewhat embarrass my schemes in your favour.

The legions from Africa<sup>d</sup> are daily expected. In the mean time, the world is greatly astonished to find that the war is broke out again in your province. Nothing, in truth, ever happened so unexpectedly; as we had promised ourselves, from the account of the victory which was brought to us on your birthday, that the peace of the republic was established for many generations. But now all our fears are revived with as much strength as ever.

You mentioned in your letter, dated the 15th of May, that you were just informed, by an express from Plancus, that Lepidus had refused to receive Antony. Should this prove to be fact, our business will be so much the easier; if not, we shall have a very difficult struggle to maintain, and it depends upon you to ease me of my great apprehensions for the event. As for my own part, I have exhausted all my powers, and I am utterly incapable of doing more than I have already performed. It is far otherwise, however, with my friend; and I not only wish but expect to see you the greatest and most distinguished of Romans. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Plancus.

NOTHING, my dear Plancus, could be more glorious to yourself, nor more acceptable to the senate than the letter you lately addressed to them<sup>e</sup> assembly: I will add too, nothing could be more opportune than the particular juncture in which it was delivered. Cornutus received it in the press of a very full house, just as he had communicated us a cold and irresolute letter from Lepidus. You was read immediately afterwards, and it was met with the loudest acclamations of applause. It was highly pleasing indeed to the senate, not only from the importance of its contents, and the zealous services to the republic of which it gave an account, but from that strength and elegant expression with which it was animated. The senate was extremely urgent that it might im-be taken into consideration : but Cornutus it proper to decline their request. However, the whole assembly expressing great indignation at the trial, the question was put by five of the tribunes of the people. When Servilius was called for his opinion, he moved that the debate be adjourned. What my sentiments were was supported in them by the unanimous voice of the whole house) you will see by the decree that passed upon this occasion. It is sensible that your own superior judgment is abundantly sufficient to direct you in all emergencies; yet I cannot forbear advising you not to seek the sanction of the senate in so critical a posture as the present, and which undoubtedly often demand immediate action. Be a senate, and, to yourself; and, without any other scruple not to pursue such measures as are to the credit of the republic shall require. In one of your actions anticipate our expectations, and give us the pleasure of hearing that you have done some glorious exploit, ere we are so much seduced that you even had it in your intention. I venture to assure you, that the senate will certainly approve both your zeal and your judgment whatever you shall thus undertake. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

I am indebted to you for your short letter by Volumnius, as well as for two others more full, one of which was brought by the courier of Titus Vibius, the other was for me by Lupus; and all of them came to me on the same day. I find, by your own account as well as by that which Græceius has given me of the war, far from being extinguished, the breaking out again with greater violence. It is sensible, if Antony should gain any advantage, that all your illustrious services to the republic will be utterly frustrated. The first we received here, and which, indeed, generally credited, represented him as having been in great consternation, attended only by frightened and disarmed soldiers. But then, after all, should be (what Græceius says) that Antony is, in fact, so strong as it is unsafe to give him battle, he does not seem much to have fled from Mutina, as to have been the seat of war. This unexpected news has given all Rome another countenance, and a great deal of disappointment appears in every face. Even some amongst us who complain of having not immediately pursued Antony; imagine, if no time had been lost, that he might have been destroyed. But it is the people in all governments, and especially, to be particularly disposed to abuse by, by licentious reflections on those who are indebted for the enjoyment of it. One should be careful not to give them any use for their censures. In one word, whoever destroys Antony is the glory of terminating the war: a hint I rather leave to your own reflections, myself into a more open explanation<sup>k</sup>.

LETTER XVII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

I WILL no longer attempt to make any formal acknowledgments of the repeated instances I receive of your friendship: mere words are a very inadequate return to those obligations which my best services can but ill repay. If you will look back upon my former letters, you cannot be at a loss to discover the reasons that prevented me from pursuing Antony immediately after the battle of Mutina. The truth, my dear Cicero, is, that I was not only unprovided both with cavalry and baggage-horses, but not having at that time had an interview with Cæsar, I could not depend on his assistance: and I was wholly ignorant, likewise, that Hirtius was killed. This will account for my not having pursued Antony on the day of the engagement. The day following I received an express from Pansa, to attend him at Bononia; but, in my way thither, being informed of his death, I immediately returned back to join my little corps. I may justly call them so, indeed, as my forces are extremely diminished, and in a very bad condition, from the great hardships they suffered during the siege. It was by these means that Antony got two days' advance of me; and, as he marched in disorder, he could retire much faster than it was in my power to pursue. He increased his forces likewise by pressing the inhabitants, and throwing open the prisons in every town through which he passed: and in this manner he continued his march till he arrived in the fens of Sabata. This is a place with which I must bring you acquainted. It is situated between the Alps and the Apennines, and the roads that lie about it are scarce practicable. When I had reached within thirty miles of Antony, I was informed that he had been joined by Ventidius, and had made a speech at the head of their combined troops, to persuade them to follow him over the Alps; assuring them that Lepidus had agreed to support him. Nevertheless, not only his own soldiers (which, indeed, are a very inconsiderable number,) but those likewise of Ventidius, repeatedly and unanimously declared that they were determined either to conquer, or perish in Italy; and at the same time desired that they might be conducted to Pollentia<sup>l</sup>. Antony found it in vain to oppose them; however, he deferred his march till the ensuing day. As soon as I received this intelligence, I detached five cohorts to Pollentia; and am now following them with the remainder of my troops. This detachment threw themselves into that city an hour before Trebellius arrived with his cavalry; a circumstance which gives me great satisfaction, as it is a point, I think, upon which our whole success depends. When the enemy found that their designs were thus frustrated, they conceived hopes of crossing the Alps into Gaul; as they supposed the four legions commanded by Plancus would not be able to withstand their united forces, and that an army from Italy could not overtake them soon enough to prevent their passage.—However, the Allobroges, together with my detachment, have hitherto been sufficient to prevent their design; which, I trust, they will find still more difficult to effect, when I shall come up with the rest of my forces. But should they happen, in the mean time, to pass the Isara, I shall exert my utmost endeavours that this circumstance may not be attended with any ill consequences to the commonwealth.

Let it raise the spirits and the hopes of the senate, to observe that Plancus and myself, together with our respective armies, act in perfect concert with each other, and are ready to hazard every danger in support of the common cause. However, whilst you thus confidently rely on our zeal and diligence, you will remit nothing, I hope, of your own, but employ your utmost care to send us a reinforcement, as well as every other necessary supply, that may render us in a condition to defend your liberties against those who have infamously conspired their ruin. One cannot, indeed, but look upon these our enemies with so much the greater indignation, as they have acted with the vilest hypocrisy, and suddenly turned those troops against their country, which they long pretended to have raised for its defence. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

I WISH you would peruse the letter I have addressed to the senate, and make what alterations a. v. 710. you shall judge proper. You will find by it, that I am under an absolute necessity of thus applying to them. Whilst I imagined that I should be joined by the fourth and martial legions<sup>a</sup>, agreeably to the decree of the senate which passed for that purpose on the motion of Paulus and Drusus, I was less solicitous about the rest; but now that I have only some new-raised regiments, and those too extremely ill-accoutred, I cannot but be apprehensive upon your accounts, as well as upon my own.

The citizens of Vicentia<sup>b</sup> have always distinguished Marcus Brutus and myself by their particular regard. I entreat you, therefore, to endeavour that justice be done them by the senate, in the affair concerning the slaves. They, are, indeed, entitled to your favour, both by the equity of their cause, and the fidelity with which they have, upon all occasions, persevered in their allegiance to the republic: whereas their adversaries, on the contrary, are a most seditious and faithless people. Farewell.

HAVING received advice that Antony was advancing with his troops towards my province, and a. v. 710. had sent before him a detachment of his cavalry under the command of his brother <sup>a</sup> These were veteran legions which had served under Cæsar. But, notwithstanding that they entered into the army of the late consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, they could by no means be prevailed with to join Decimus Brutus, in resentment, 'tis probable, of the part he bore in the conspiracy against their favourite general.—Ep. Fam. xl. 14.

Lucius, I moved with my army from the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar<sup>a</sup>, in order to oppose their passage. I continued my march without halting, till I arrived at Forum Vocoii, and am now encamped somewhat beyond that town, on the river Argenteus<sup>b</sup>, opposite to Antony. Ventidius has joined him with his three legions, and has formed his camp a little above mine. Antony, before this conjunction, had the second legion entire, together with a considerable number of men, though indeed wholly unarmed, who escaped from the general slaughter of his other legions: he is extremely strong in cavalry; for, as none of those troops suffered in the late action, he has no less than *** horse. Great numbers of his soldiers, both horse and foot, are continually deserting to my camp; so that his troops diminish every day. Both Silanus<sup>c</sup> and Culeo<sup>d</sup> have left his army, and are returned to mine. But notwithstanding I was greatly offended by their going to Antony, contrary to my inclination, yet, in regard to the connexions that subsist between us, and in compliance with my usual clemency, I have thought proper to pardon them. However, I do not, upon any occasion, employ their services, nor, indeed, suffer them to remain in the camp.

As to what concerns my conduct in this war, you may depend upon it I shall not be wanting in my duty either to the senate or the republic; and whatever farther measures I shall take to this end, I shall not fail to communicate them to you.

The friendship between us has upon all occasions been inviolably preserved on both sides, and we have mutually vied in our best good offices to each other. But I doubt not that, since this great and sudden commotion has been raised in the commonwealth, some false and injurious reports have been spread of me by my enemies, which, in the zeal of your heart for the interest of the republic, have given you much uneasiness. I have the satisfaction, however, to be informed by my agents at Rome, that you are by no means disposed easily to credit these idle rumours; for which I thank myself, as I justly ought, extremely obliged to you. I am so, likewise, for the former instances of your friendship, in promoting my public honours, the grateful remembrance of which, be assured, is indelibly impressed upon my heart.

Let me conjure you, my dear Cicero, if you are sensible that my public conduct has upon all occasions been worthy of the name I bear, to be persuaded that I shall continue to act with equal, or, if possible, even with superior zeal<sup>e</sup>. Let me hope, too, that the greater the favours are which you have conferred upon me, the more you will think yourself engaged to support my credit and character. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

Plancus to Cicero.

70 have been apprised, no doubt, by Lævus Nerva, as well as by the letter they delivered to you on my part, of the design I was meditating when they left me; as, indeed, have constantly borne a share in all my ills and measures of every kind. It has not, however, to me, what happens not justly I suppose to every man who is of his reputation, and desirous of approving himself to the friends of his country: I have up a safer scheme, as being liable perhaps to ill-natured exceptions, in exchange for a dangerous one that may better evince my I am to inform you, then, that, after the 710. of my lieutenants, I received two letters from Lepidus, entreating me to join him. These were seconded by the much stronger solicitations of Crensis, who earnestly represented to me indeed, I am also apprehensive of myself) is a great reason to fear a mutiny among affected troops under the conduct of Lepidus. I determined immediately, therefore, to march to the place, and take an equal share in the danger which he was threatened. I was sensible, at the same time, that to wait on the banks of the river, Brutus should pass that river with his army to meet the enemy in conjunction with Crensis, whose forces, as well as their general, were in perfect harmony with me and my measures would be much the most cautious measure next to my own personal security. But I thought that if any misfortune should attend it would be wholly imputed to me, and I was condemned either as obstinately suffering myself to prevent me from giving succour to any in the cause of the republic, or of refusing to take part in the danger of a most necessary war. As my presence, therefore, was to be a mean of protecting Lepidus, and of putting his army into a better disposition, I exposed myself to all hazards, rather than to act with too much circumspection. But any man more anxious in an affair for his name in no sort answerable, than I am in this; for though I should have no manner of interest in the army of Lepidus were not concerned, under that circumstance, I am full of concern for the event. Had it been my business to have met Antony before my junction with him, I am sure he would not have been so kept the field against me even a single day as the confidence I have in my own measures so heartily do I despise his broken measures as those of that paltry multerer, the man Ventidius. But, as the case is now, I dread to think what may be the result, should any ill humours lie concealed in the mind of Lepidus; as they may possibly all their malignity, before they can be even discovered. It is certain, however, that Lepidus, together with the well-affected part of his army, would be exposed to great danger, if we should not act in conjunction: besides that, our infamous enemies would gain a very considerable advantage, should they draw off any of his forces. If my presence, therefore, should prove a mean of preventing these evils, I shall think myself much indebted to my courage and good fortune for engaging me to make the experiment. With this design I moved with my army from the banks of the Isara on the 21st of May, having first erected a fort at each end of the bridge which I had thrown over that river, and placed a strong party to defend it, that when Brutus shall arrive, he may have nothing to retard his passage. I have only to add, that I hope to join Lepidus within eight days from the date of this letter. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

From the same to Cicero.

I SHOULD be ashamed that this letter is so little consistent with my former, if it arose from any instability of my own. But it is much otherwise; and I have steadily pursued every measure in my power to engage Lepidus to act in concert with me, for the defence of the republic, imagining it would render you less apprehensive of my success against our wretched enemies. To this end, I not only complied with all the conditions he proposed, but even engaged for more than he demanded; and I had so much confidence in the sincerity of his intentions, that I ventured to assure you, no longer than two days ago, that he would zealously co-operate with me in carrying on the war upon one common plan. I depended, indeed, upon the promises he had given me under his own hand, together with the assurances I had likewise received from Laterensis, who was at that time in my camp, and who earnestly conjured me to forget all resentments against Lepidus, and to rely upon his good faith. But Lepidus has now put it out of my power to entertain these favourable hopes of him any longer: however, I have taken, and shall continue to take, all necessary precautions, that the republic may not be prejudiced by my too easy credulity. I am to inform you, then, that after I had used the utmost expedition (agreeably to his own earnest request) to transport my army over the Isara; and for that purpose had, in the space of a single day, thrown a bridge across that river, I received a counter-express from him, requiring me to advance no farther, as he should not have occasion, he said, for my assistance. Nevertheless, I will own to you I was so imprudent as to proceed in my march, believing that the true reason of his thus changing his mind arose from an unwillingness to have a partner with him in his glory. I imagined that, without depriving him of any share of that honour which he seemed so desirous to monopolise, I might post myself at some convenient distance, in order to be ready to support him with my troops, in case he should be pressed by the enemy: an event which, in the simplicity of my heart, I thought not improbable. In the mean time, I received a letter from the excellent Laterensis, which was conceived in terms full of despair. He complained that he had been greatly deceived, and assured me that neither Lepidus nor his army was to be trusted. He expressly cautioned me, at the same time, to be upon my guard against their artifices; adding, that he had faithfully discharged the engagements he had entered into, on his part, and hoped I would act with the same fidelity to the republic on mine. I have sent a copy of this letter to Titius, and purpose to transmit the originals of all the rest relating to this affair, by the hands of Lævus Cispinus, who was privy to the whole transaction. I shall insert in this packet the letters of Lepidus, to which I did not give any credit, as well as those to which I did.

I must not forget to add, that when Lepidus harangued his soldiers, these mighty honest fellows were exceedingly clamorous for peace. They protested that, after the loss of both the consuls, after the destruction of so many brave men, who had perished in defence of their country, and after Antony and his adherents had been declared enemies of the commonwealth, and their estates confiscated, they were determined not to draw their swords any more, either on the one side or the other. They were prompted to behave thus mutinously, not only by the insolent suggestions of their own hearts, but by the encouragement also of their officers, particularly Canidius, Rufrenus, and others, whose names the senate shall be acquainted with at a proper season. Lepidus was so far from punishing this sedition, that he did not take even a single step to restrain it. I thought, therefore, that it would be the highest temerity to expose my own faithful troops, together with my auxiliaries, which are commanded by some of the most considerable chiefs of Gaul, and in effect, too, my whole province to their combined armies. I considered, if I should thus lose my life, and involve the republic in my own destruction, I should fall, not only without honour, but without pity. In consequence of these reflections, I have determined to march my forces back again, that our wretched enemies may not have so great an advantage as my advancing any farther might possibly give them. I shall endeavour to post my army so advantageously as to cover the province under my command from being insulted, even supposing the troops of Lepidus should actually revolt. In short, it shall be my care to preserve everything in its present situation, till the senate shall send an army hither, and vindicate the liberties of the republic with the same success in this part of the world as attended their arms before the walls of Mutina. In the mean time, be assured that no man will act with more fervent zeal than myself in all the various occurrences of the war; and I shall most readily either encounter the enemy in the field, or sustain the hardships of a siege, or even lay down my life itself, as any of these circumstances shall prove necessary for the service of the senate. Let me exhort you, then, my dear Cicero, to exert your utmost efforts to send a speedy reinforcement to me, ere Antony shall have increased the number of his forces, or our own shall be entirely dispirited. For, if despatch be given to this affair, these infamous banditti will undoubtedly be extirpated, and the republic remain in full possession of her late victory. Take care of your health, and continue your friendship to me.

P. S.—I know not whether it may be necessary to make any excuse for the absence of my brother.

who was prevented from attending me in this expedition by a slow fever, occasioned by the great fatigues he has lately undergone. As no man has shown more zeal or courage in the cause of the republic, he will undoubtedly return to the duties of his post the very first moment his health shall permit.

I recommend my honours to your protection; though I must confess, at the same time, that all my desires ought to be satisfied, since I enjoy the privilege of your friendship, and the satisfaction of seeing you invested with the high credit and authority I have ever wished you. I will leave it, therefore, entirely to yourself, both when and in what manner I shall experience the effect of your good offices; and will only request you to suffer me to succeed Hirtius in your affection, as I certainly do in the respect and esteem he bore you. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

To Furnius<sup>1</sup>.

If the interest of the republic requires the continuance of your services, and it be necessary (A. U. 710.

all the world, indeed, is of opinion it is) that you should bear a part in those important operations, which must extinguish the remaining flames of the war, you cannot, surely, be engaged in a more worthy, a more laudable, or a more illustrious pursuit. I think, therefore, you should by no means interrupt your approved efforts in the cause of liberty, for the sake of obtaining the prætorship somewhat earlier than you are regularly entitled to enjoy it. I say your approved efforts; for let not my friend be ignorant of the fame which his conduct has acquired. Believe me it is inferior only to that of Plancus himself, but by his own confession, and in the judgment, too, of all the world. If there is any farther service then, remaining for you to perform to your country, you ought to pursue it with an unbroken application, as an employment, of all others, the most truly honourable: and what, my friend, shall stand in competition with true honour? But should you imagine that you have amply satisfied the duty you owe to the commonwealth, I do not dissuade you from hastening hither when the time of elections shall approach, provided this ambitious impatience shall nothing diminish from the heat of that reputation you have so justly obtained. I could name, however, many instances of persons of great distinction, who, during their engagements in the service of the republic abroad, have renounced their legal pretensions of soliciting employments at home; a sacrifice which, in your own case, will be so much the less, as you are at present strictly qualified to offer yourself as candidate. Had you already, indeed, passed through the office of ædile, and two years<sup>2</sup> intervened since your exercising that function, self-denial would have been greater; whereas now you will forego nothing of the usual and stated time of petitioning for the post in question. I am very sensible that your interest is much too strong to require the assistance of Plancus: nevertheless, should his arms be attended with the success we wish, your applications would certainly appear with greater advantage, were they deferred till the time of his consulate.

<sup>2</sup> By the laws of Rome a man could not be chosen prætor till two years after he had served the office of ædile: and the same distance of time was likewise required between the prætorship and the consulate.

Thus much (as I was willing you should know your sentiments) I thought proper to say; but more, am persuaded, your own good sense and judgment would render unnecessary. The sum of all, in, is shortly this: that I would have you regulate your conduct, upon all occurrences, not by the common standard of popular ambition, but by that true and solid glory, and look upon a lasting station as of more value than the transient joy of enjoying the prætorian office somewhat higher than usual. I had a consultation the other day at my house upon this subject, with your good friends Cæcina, Calvisius, and my brother, at which your freedman Dardanus was wise present; and they every one of them joined in the opinion I have here given you. But in all, you yourself are the best and most competent judge. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

FRIENDSHIP and gratitude make me feel, upon account, what I never felt upon my own; and I will confess, that I am not without fear in regard to a story which has been related concerning you. I thought I it by no matter to be despised when I had only of it, as I frequently did, from common; but it has lately been mentioned to me, by, by Segulius. This man tells me (though he says, indeed, is generally of a piece with that of his character) that paying a visit at to, where you were much the subject of the conversation, Cæsar complained (and it was the only it seems, which he brought against you) of ambiguous expression<sup>a</sup> which you had made use of concerning him. I suspect the whole to be a mere of Segulius, or, at least, that it was he him-<sup>a</sup> expression itself is inserted in the original; but as upon an ambiguity that will not hold in our language was impossible to preserve it in the translation. adum adolescentem, (Cicero is charged with having adum adolescentem, tolendum," the last of which words of a double meaning, and may imply either that should be advanced to the dignities of the state, is life should be taken away. The polite and unegregious of Cicero's conduct has endeavoured to his admired hero from a charge so little favourable to his prudence and his honour, and it is to be at his arguments were as convincing as they are.

In a point, however, that does not admit of in proof, candour will incline on the favourable side. I cannot but agree with an excellent author, accusation was true, "it very much takes off the gratitude of Octavius, in consenting to the death of Cæsar; since such double-dealing could hardly be named an obligation, let the effects of it be so advantageous."—Life of Cicero, p. 281; Observ. on Cic. iii. p. 54.

self who reported these words to Cæsar. Segulius endeavoured, at the same time, to persuade me that you are in great danger of falling a victim to the resentment of the veteran legions, who speak of you, he pretends, with much indignation. The principal cause, it seems, of their displeasure is, that both Cæsar and myself are left out of the commission for dividing the lands<sup>b</sup> among the soldiers, and that everything is disposed of just as you and your friends at Rome think proper.

Notwithstanding that I was on my march<sup>c</sup> when I received this account, yet I thought it would not be advisable to pass the Alps till I had informed myself how affairs stand. I am well persuaded, nevertheless, that with respect to yourself, these reports and menaces of the veterans aim at nothing farther than by alarming your fears, and incensing the young Cæsar against you, to obtain for themselves a more considerable proportion of the rewards decreed by the senate. But I do not intend, by saying this, to dissuade you from standing upon your guard, as nothing, be assured, is more valuable to me than your life. Let me only caution you not to suffer your fears to run you into greater dangers than those you would avoid. However, I would advise you to obviate the clamours of these veterans, as far as you reasonably may; and to comply with their desires, both in regard to the decemvirs<sup>d</sup> and to the distribution of their rewards. As to those forfeited estates which belonged to the veterans who served under Antony, I should be glad, if you think proper, that Cæsar and myself may be nominated to assign them to the troops. But in reference to the pecuniary donative which they have been also promised, it will be proper to act with more deliberation, and as the circumstances of the public finances shall require: to which end it may be signified to them, that the senate will take these their claims into consideration. As to those other four legions to whom the senate has also decreed an allotment of lands, I imagine that the estates in Campania, together with those which were formerly seized by Sylla, will be sufficient for the purpose. I should think, too, that the best method of division would be, either to parcel out those lands in equal shares to the several legions, or to determine their respective proportions by lot. But when I thus give you my opinion, it is by no means as pretending to superior judgment, but merely from the affection of my heart towards you, and from my sincere desire that the public tranquillity may be preserved, which, I am very sensible, if any accidents should happen to you, cannot possibly be maintained.

I do not purpose to march out of Italy, unless I should find it greatly expedient. Meanwhile I am employed in disciplining my troops, and furnishing them with arms: and I hope to appear with no contemptible body of forces, upon any emergency that shall again call me into the field. But Cæsar, however, has not sent back the legion to me which served in Pansa's army.

I request your immediate answer to this letter; and if you should have anything of importance to

ALL things here go on well<sup>1</sup>: and it shall be my endeavour to render them still better. Lepidus seems to be favourably disposed towards
A. U. 710. me; and, indeed, we have reason to divest ourselves of all our fears, and to act with undaunted freedom in defence of the commonwealth. But had our affairs a far less promising aspect, yet it might justly animate and augment that courage which I know always resides in your breast, to reflect that we have three powerful armies<sup>2</sup> devoted to the service of the republic, and that Fortune has already declared in our favour.

The report which I mentioned in my former letter is evidently calculated to intimidate you. But believe me, if you exert a proper spirit, the whole united party will be unable to withstand your eloquence.

I purpose, agreeably to what I told you in my last, to remain in Italy till I shall hear from you. Farewell.

Eporedia, May the 25th.

LETTER XXV.

To Planus.

THE news from your part of the world is so extremely variable and contradictory, that I am utterly at a loss what to write. Sometimes the accounts we receive of Lepidus are agreeable to our wishes, and at others entirely the reverse. All reports, however, concur in assuring us, that you are superior to every danger, either from fraud or force. If you are in some degree indebted for the latter to Fortune, it is certain that the former, at least, is owing to your prudence alone.

I am informed, by a letter from your colleague<sup>3</sup>, dated the 15th of May, that you mentioned, in one of your expresses to him, that Lepidus had refused to receive Antony. We should have been more disposed to credit this intelligence, if you had taken notice of it in any of your despatches to Rome. But, perhaps, you would not venture to communicate to us this piece of good news, as having been a little premature in an account of the same kind in your last. Every man, indeed, is liable to be deceived by his wishes; but all the world knows that you can never be imposed upon by any other means. In the present instance, however, all possibility of farther error is removed: for to stumble twice against the same stone is a disgrace, you know, even to a proverb. Should the truth prove agreeable then to what you mentioned in your letter to your colleague, all our fears are at an end:

* A town not far from Verocella, from whence the last letter from Brutus was dated. See letter 18 of this book.

nevertheless, we shall not dismiss them till we receive a confirmation of this account from your own hand.

I have often assured you of my firm persuasion, that the whole credit of delivering the commonwealth from this civil war, will devolve entirely upon that general who shall extinguish these its last surviving flames: an honour which I hope, and believe, is reserved solely for yourself.

It is with great pleasure, though without the least surprise, that I find you entertain such grateful sentiments of my zeal in your service. Higher, indeed, it cannot possibly rise; but you may depend upon my exerting it to more important purposes, if affairs in your part of the world should succeed as we wish. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

As I found, when I applied to Brutus in Macedonia, that he would not soon be prepared to march to the assistance of this province<sup>2</sup>, I

A. U. 710. determined to return hither, in order to collect what remained of the public money, and to remit it with all possible expedition to Rome. In the interval I received intelligence that Dolabella's fleet appeared upon the coast of Lycia<sup>3</sup>, and that he had procured above a hundred transport-vessels, intending, if he should not succeed in his designs upon Syria<sup>4</sup>, to sail directly with his forces to Italy, and join the Antonys and the rest of those infamous rebels. I was so much alarmed at this account, that I thought proper to postpone all other affairs, and immediately proceed in quest of this fleet. And notwithstanding my ships were unequal both in number and size to those of the enemy, I should probably have destroyed their whole fleet, if I had not been obstructed by the Rhodians: however, I have disabled the greatest part of it, and dispersed the rest. I have taken likewise every one of their transports, the soldiers and officers on board having quitted them upon the first notice of my approach. In a word, I have succeeded in the main of my design, having defeated a scheme which I greatly dreaded, and prevented Dolabella from strengthening our enemies by transporting his forces into Italy.

I refer you to the letter which I have written to the senate<sup>5</sup>, for an account of the ill-treatment I received from the Rhodians, though indeed I have by no means represented it in its strongest colours. These people, in consequence of their imagining that the affairs of the commonwealth were utterly desperate, behaved towards me with the most insufferable insolence. But their affronts to my own person are in no sort the foundation of my complaints: I have ever disregarded injuries of this kind, that centred entirely in myself. It is their infection to the republic, their attachment to the opposite party, their constant ill offices to all those who distinguish themselves in the support of our liberties, that I thought demanded my resentment. Let me not be understood, however, as passing an indiscriminate censure upon the whole and in general: far am I, indeed, from thinking them all equally infected with the same principles. I know not by what fatality it happens, that these very magistrates who refused to give protection my father, to Lucius Lentulus, to Pompey, and the rest of those illustrious chiefs who fled into the island after the battle of Pharsalia, are all of them, at this juncture, either actually in the administration themselves, or possess an unlimited licence over those who are. Accordingly, they conducted themselves in this affair with their impartial malevolence; and it is not only expedient, indeed, absolutely necessary, that the republic should interpose her authority, lest the insolence of the people should rise to still greater heights, by giving any longer unchastised.

I hope you will continue, as usual, to take the interests under your protection: and that you upon all occasions, both in the senate, and in every other instance, promote my honours with your suffrage. As the province of Asia is decreed to the consuls, with a power of appointing whom they shall think proper to administer the government till their arrival; I entreat you to employ your interest with them to confer this dignity upon me. The situation of affairs in this province requires no means require their presence before the termination of their consular office, or in any sort it necessary that they should send hither an ambassador for Dolabella is now in Syria: and, agree to what you declared with your usual prophesying, he will certainly be defeated by the time the consuls can possibly arrive. Accordingly he has been obliged to abandon the siege of Laodicea, and has retreated to Laodicea, a sea-port city of Syria, as the only city in which he could

I hope he will soon meet with the fate he deserves; or rather, indeed, I am perpetually has already attended him, for he has no resource to which he can retreat, and it is impossible he should make any long or effectual resistance against so powerful an army as that which Cassius has led against him. I imagine, that Pansa and Hirtius will be in no haste to leave these provinces, but rather choose to remain in their consular year at Rome. For this reason I am inclined to hope that you may prevail upon them to appoint me their substitute.

I have received assurances from both of them, as I have by letter, that no successor should be appointed to my office during their consulate: and I have lately repeated the same promise to my friends. Believe me, it is not from any anxiety that I desire to be continued some time in this province. But as I have met with Pansa, the news of whose death, together with the battles in which they fell, had not yet reached the knowledge of Lentulus.

Shortly afterwards proved to be the fact; for Cassius forced the city of Laodicea to surrender, Dolabella to avoid falling into the hands of his enemy, sacrificed his own life by the assistance of one of his friends who he commanded to be his executioner.—Vell.

with many difficulties and disadvantages in the discharge of my functions, I should extremely regret the being obliged to resign my post before I shall have fully reaped the fruit of my labours. If it were in my power to remit to Rome the whole of those assessments I had actually levied, I should be so far from wishing to remain here, that I should desire to be recalled. But I am very solicitous to receive the money I advanced to Cassius; to replace what I lost by the death of Trebonius, and the oppressions of Dolabella; as well as to recover the several sums which are due to me from those who have perfidiously broken the good faith they owed both to myself and to the republic. Now, these are points which I can by no means effect, unless the time of my continuance in this province be prolonged: a privilege which I hope to obtain by the interposition of your usual good offices.

I persuade myself that my services to the commonwealth give me just reason to expect, not the honour only of administering this province, but as high dignities as Cassius and the two Bruti: as I not only shared with them in forming the design and undergoing the hazard of that ever-memorable enterprise against Caesar, but have exerted myself with equal zeal and spirit in all our present commotions. I was the first, let me boast, that bid defiance to the oppressive laws of Antony. I was the first that brought over the cavalry of Dolabella to the interest of the republic, and delivered them into the hands of Cassius. I was the first who levied troops in defence of our common liberties against the infamous attempts of those who have conspired our destruction: and it is owing entirely to me that Syria, together with the army in that province, joined themselves under Cassius in the support of the republic. The truth is, if I had not very expeditiously contributed those large subsidies, both of men and money, with which I supplied Cassius, he would not have ventured to march into Syria: and the name of Dolabella would now have been no less formidable to the republic than that of Antony himself. Yet, at the same time that I acted thus warmly for the interest of the republic, I had every private bias that could draw me to the opposite party. Dolabella was my friend and companion, as the Antonys were my nearest relations: and it was by the united good offices of the latter that I obtained the quaestorship of this province. But the love of my country was superior to every other attachment; and I stood forth the first to declare war against the strongest and most endearing connexions both of blood and friendship. Inconsiderable, it must be acknowledged, is the fruit which I have hitherto reaped from these instances of my patriotism. However, I do not despair: and I shall unweariedly persevere, not only in displaying my zeal for our liberties, but in exposing myself to every difficulty and every danger for their support. Nevertheless, I cannot but add, if I were to be encouraged by some of those honours I have merited from the senate and from every friend to our country, they would give me an authority which would enable me to act with greater advantage to the common cause.

I did not see your son when I was with Brutus, as he was just gone into winter-quarters with the cavalry<sup>4</sup>. But I had the satisfaction of finding that he was in general esteem: which gave me great pleasure, not only on his account and yours, but likewise upon my own. For I cannot but consider a son of yours, that thus copies out his father's virtues, as standing in the relation to me of a brother. Farewell.

LETTER XXVII.

Lentulus, Proquaestor and Proprator, to the Consuls, the Prators, the Tribunes of the People, the Senate, and the Commons of Rome.

As soon as Dolabella had possessed himself of Asia<sup>6</sup> by the most infamous and cruel act of treachery<sup>7</sup>, I applied immediately to the army in Macedonia under the command of the illustrious Marcus Brutus, as the nearest assistance to which I could have recourse, in order to recover this province as soon as possible to the dominion of the commonwealth. But Dolabella being apprehensive of my design, advanced with so much rapidity, that he had got out of these territories before it was possible that the forces I had solicited could arrive. In his march, however, he laid the whole country waste, seized upon the public money, and not only plundered the Roman citizens of their effects, but most inhumanly sold them as slaves. I did not think it necessary, therefore, to defer my departure out of Macedonia till the troops of Brutus should be ready. It appeared to be most for the advantage of the republic, that I should return with all expedition to the duties of my post, in order to levy the remainder of the public taxes, to collect the money I had deposited, to inquire what part of it had been seized, and by whose neglect: in a word, to transmit to you a full and faithful account of the state in which I should find the affairs of this province. With these views, I embarked; but as I was sailing among the Greek islands, I received intelligence that Dolabella's fleet lay off the coast of Lycia, and that the Rhodians had a considerable number of ships of war ready to sail. I resolved, therefore, to put back to Rhodes with the ships that attended me, and which were now joined by those under the command of Patiscus, the proquaestor; a person whom I must mention as most intimately united with me, not only by the ties of friendship, but by the same common sentiments towards the republic. I assured myself that the Rhodians would give me assistance, in the first place, from their regard to the authority of your decree, by which Dolabella is declared an enemy to his country; and in the next, as they stood engaged by a solemn treaty renewed with us in the consulate of Marcus Marcellus and Servius Sulpicius, to consider the enemies of the republic, in all respects, as their own. But I was greatly deceived in my expectation; they were so far from being inclined to strengthen my fleet with any of their own ships, that they would not suffer it to enter their harbour. They even refused to furnish our soldiers with provisions and water; and it was with difficulty I obtained permission myself to sail into their port with two small vessels. However, I did not think proper to resent this insult upon the rights and the majesty of the Roman people; deeming it of more importance, in the present conjuncture, to frustrate the designs of Dolabella. For I had discovered, by some intercepted letters, that it was his purpose, if he failed in his attempt upon Syria and Egypt, (as fail I was sure he must,) to proceed directly with his band of robbers and their plunder to Italy. Accordingly, in view to this his scheme, he had pressed, out of the ports of Lycia, a considerable number of transports, none of them less than fifty-six tons burthen<sup>8</sup>, and these were strongly guarded by his fleet. Being greatly alarmed, therefore, coarsely<sup>9</sup> fathers, at this dangerous design, I resolved to pour with the injurious treatment of the Rhodians, and to submit to every milder expedient of gaining them over to our interest. For this purpose, I suffered myself to be introduced into their senate in the manner they thought proper; where I represented, in the strongest terms I was capable, the danger to which the republic would be exposed, if that infamous rebel should transport his forces into Italy. But I found them most perversely disposed to imagine that the friends of the republic were the weaker party; that the general association in favour of our liberties was by no means voluntary; that the senate would still patiently suffer the insolence of Dolabella; and that no man would venture to vote him a public enemy. To be short, they were more inclined to believe the false reports that had been propagated by the disaffected, than to credit my representations, though entirely agreeable to truth. In conformity with this disposition, they had sent, before my arrival in the island, two several embassies to Dolabella, notwithstanding his late assassination of Trebonius, and the many other flagitious acts which he committed in this province. And this they did by an unexampled violation of their laws, and contrary to the express prohibitions of the magistrates who were then in office. But whether this conduct was owing to their fears for the territories they possess on the continent, as they themselves allege, or whether it to be imputed to the factious influence of a few of their principal magistrates, who formerly treated some of our illustrious countrymen with equal dignity, I know not. This, however, is certain, but I could not prevail with them to take any measures to obviate an evil which it was very easy for them to prevent: and all the arguments I could use, either with respect to my own personal danger, or in regard to that which threatened the public, if this traitor with his banditti, after being driven from Syria, should transport themselves into Italy, proved utterly ineffectual. It is even suspected, that the magistrates themselves abused us with various pretences of delay, till they could send intelligence to Dolabella's fleet of our approach. And, indeed, there were some circumstances that greatly increased this suspicion, particularly that Sextius Marius, and Caius Titius, lieutenants of Dolabella, suddenly quitted the fleet, and abandoned their transports, which had cost them so much time and pains to collect. Be it as it will, I pursued my voyage from Rhodes towards Lycia, and falling in with the enemy, I recovered all their transports, and have restored them to their owners. By these means I have obstructed to me so much feared, and have removed all apprehensions of Dolabella's passing into Italy with a rascal crew. I chased the enemy as far as Sidon, which is the utmost limit of my province; where I ordered that part of them were separated, and that the rest had steered in company together towards the island of Cyprus. Having thus dismissed this squadron, and knowing that brave commander and excellent patriot, the illustrious Cassius, had a considerable fleet in those parts, I returned to the duties of my employment: it shall be my endeavour, conscript fathers, to both you and the republic full proofs of my ardent zeal. To this end I shall exert my constant assiduity in collecting the public revenues, which I shall transmit to you, together with all accounts, as expeditiously as possible. If I have time, likewise, to make a progress through the province, in order to inquire into the conduct of those with whom I intrusted the care of the finances, I shall not fail to send a list of such who shall appear to have been faithful to their duty as well as of those who, by voluntarily betraying it, have rendered themselves partners in the guilt of Dolabella. Let me add, that if you think proper to chastise these last according to their demerits, the execution of your justice will strengthen my authority, and enable me, with more facility, to raise and preserve the order of the public taxes. In the meanwhile, I shall endeavour to secure the public revenue, and to provide for the province from future insults, I have (what, indeed, was extremely wanting) a small number of troops composed entirely of volunteers. I wrote the above, about thirty Asiatic troops, who deserted from Dolabella in Syria, are in Pamphylia. They relate that Dolabella appeared before the walls of Antiochia, in Syria, and finding that the inhabitants had shut the city gates against him, he made several attempts to enter by force, but was always repulsed with great disadvantage. At length, having lost about a hundred men, he retired in the night, and fled towards Laodicea, leaving all his sick and wounded behind him. They add, that the same night almost the whole of his Asiatic troops deserted; eight hundred of which returned to Antiochia, and surrendered themselves to the officers of the garrison, which Cassius had left in that town; the rest (of which number these soldiers are) came down into Cilicia by Mount Amanus: in fine, that Cassius, with his whole army, was reported to have been but four days' march from Laodicea when Dolabella retired towards that city. I am persuaded, therefore, that this most infamous villain will meet with the punishment he deserves much sooner than we expected.

<sup>9</sup> This appellation was at first given as a mark of distinction to those particular senators who were added by Tarquinius Priscus, or by the people at the settling of the commonwealth, to the hundred which originally composed the senate as it was instituted by Romulus. But in after-times it became a common title, which was promiscuously made use of in all addresses to that great council of the republic.—Manutius de Senat.

LETTER XXVIII.

*Lepidus, Emperor and sovereign Pontiff*, to the Senate and People of Rome†.*

HEAVEN and earth will bear me witness, conscript fathers, that there is nothing I have at all times more sincerely desired than the preservation of our common liberties: and I should soon have convinced you of this truth, if Fortune had not forced me to renounce those measures I purposed to pursue. My whole army, indeed, expressed their usual tenderness towards their fellow-countrymen, by a mutinous opposition to my designs; and, to own the truth, they absolutely compelled me not to refuse my protection to such a multitude of Roman citizens. I conjure you then, conscript fathers, to judge of this affair, not by the suggestions of private resentment, but by the interest of the commonwealth: nor let it be imputed as a crime to me and my army, that, amidst our civil dissensions, we yielded to the dictates of compassion and humanity. Be assured, that by acting with an equal regard to the safety and honour of all parties, you will best consult both your own and your country's advantage. Farewell.

From my camp, at Pons Argenteus, May the 30th.

† This letter was written by Lepidus to the senate, in order to excuse the junction of his forces with those of Antony, which was effected the day before its date. But though he represents himself as merely passive in that transaction, and to have been forced into it by a general revolt of his troops; yet it most evidently appears to have been in consequence of a secret treaty which had been in agitation during some months before, between him and Antony.

To Plancus.

THOUGH I am too well assured of the disposition of your heart, to require any formal declarations of your gratitude, yet I cannot but confess that I received your acknowledgments with great pleasure, as they afforded me the most evident proof of the affection you bear me. I was always, indeed, perfectly sensible of your friendship; but it never appeared to me in a stronger or more advantageous light.

Your letter to the senate was extremely well received, not only from the important account it brought us of your wise and heroic measures, but as it was greatly admired likewise for the strength and elegance of its composition. Let it be your earnest labour, my dear Plancus, to extinguish the remains of this war, which if you should happily effect, you will acquire the most consummate credit and reputation. I wish all possible prosperity to the republic; yet, believe me, spent as I am with my utmost efforts to preserve it from destruction, I am scarce more solicitous for the liberties of my country, than for the glory of my friend. I hope that the immortal gods have placed within your power a most favourable opportunity of increasing your fame; and let me entreat you to embrace it, my dear Plancus, in the full persuasion that whoever shall destroy Antony, will have the honour of terminating this most execrable and alarming war. Farewell.

LETTER II.

Asinius Pollio to Cicero.

IT is owing to Lepidus, who detained my couriers above a week, that I did not receive earlier advice of the several actions near Mutina; though, indeed, I should be glad to have been the last that was informed of this unhappy news, if it were utterly out of my power to be of any assistance in redressing its consequences. I wish the senate had ordered me into Italy, when they sent for Plancus and Lepidus; for if I had been present, the republic would not have received this cruel wound. And though some, perhaps, may rejoice in this event, from the great number of principal officers and veteran soldiers of the Cæsarian party who have perished, yet they will undoubtedly find reason to lament it, when they shall be sensible of the terrible desolation it has brought upon their country. For if what is related, concerning the number of the slain, be in any degree true, the flower and strength of our armies are entirely cut off.

I was well aware of the great advantage it would have proved to the republic, if I could have joined Lepidus; as I should have been able, especially with the assistance of Plancus, to have dissipated those doubts which occasioned his delay in declaring for the senate. But the letters which I received from him being written (as you will perceive by the copies I herewith transmit) in the same spirit with those speeches which, it is said, he made to his army at Narbo*, I found it necessary to act with some sort of artifice towards him, if I hoped to obtain leave to march my troops through his province. I was apprehensive, likewise, if an engagement should happen before I could execute my designs, that the known friendship I had with Antony (though not superior, indeed, to that which Plancus entertained for him) would give my enemies an occasion of misrepresenting my intentions. For these reasons I despatched two couriers from Gades†, in the month of April, by two different ships, with letters, not only to you, and to Octavius, but to the consuls also, requesting, to be informed in what manner my services might most avail the republic. But, if I am right in my calculation, these ships did not sail till the very day on which the battle was fought between Pansa and Antony; as that was the soonest, I think, since the winter, that these seas were navigable. To these reasons for not marching, I must add, that I had so little apprehension of this civil war, that I settled the winter-quarters of my troops in the very remotest parts of Lusitania‡. Both armies, it should seem, were as eager to come to an action, as if their greatest fears on each side were, lest some less destructive expedient might be found of composing our disturbances. However, if circumstances required so much precipitation, I must deplore Hirtius the justice to acknowledge, that he conducted himself with all the skill and courage of a consummate general.

I am informed, by my letters from that part of Gaul which is under the command of Lepidus, that Pansa's whole army is cut to pieces, and that he himself is since dead of his wounds. They add, that the martial legion is entirely destroyed, and that Lucius Fabatus, Caius Peducaeus, and Decimus Carfulenus, are among the number of the slain. My intelligence farther assures me, that in the subsequent attack by Hirtius, both he and Antony lost all their legions; that the fourth legion, after having taken Antony's camp, was engaged and defeated by the fifth, with terrible slaughter; that Hirtius, together with Pontius Aquila, and, as it is reported, Octavius likewise, were killed in the action. If this should prove true, (which the gods forbid,) I shall be very greatly concerned. My advices farther import, that Antony has, with great disgrace, abandoned the siege of Mutina; however, that he has complete regiments of horse still remaining, together with one which belongs to Publius Bagienus, as also a considerable number of disarmed soldiers; that Ventidius has joined him with the seventh, the eighth, and the ninth legions; and that Antony is determined, if there should be no hopes of gaining Lepidus, to have recourse to the last expedient, and arm not only the provincials, but even the ves; in fine, that Lucius Antonius, after having undered the city of Parma, has posted himself on the Alps. If these several particulars are e, there is no time to be lost; and every man o wishes that the republic, or even the name of Roman people, may subsist, should immediately, without waiting for the express orders of senate, contribute his utmost assistance to inguish these dreadful flames. I hear that cinus Brutus is at the head of only seventeen orts, together with two incomplete legions of -raised troops, which had been levied by Any. I doubt not, however, that the remains of forces commanded by Hirtius will join him. I e so at least; as there is little, I think, to be acted from any new recruits that may be raised; cially since nothing can be more dangerous : to give Antony time to recover strength. ly next letters from Italy will determine the of my operations; and, as the corn is now cut n, and partly carried in, I shall be more at ty to execute them without obstruction from eason of the year. In the mean time, let me e you, that I will neither desert, nor survive d, epublic. It is a misfortune, however, that my nce from the scene of action is so great, and eads so infested, that it is often six weeks, and times more, ere I can be informed of any that has happened. To Decimus Brutus.

MAY every god confound that most infamous of all human beings, the execrable Segulius! For a. u. 710. do you imagine, my friend, that he has told this idle tale to none but Cæsar, or to you? Be assured he has related it to every mortal that would give him the hearing. I am much obliged to you, however, for informing me of this contemptible report; as it is a very strong instance, my dear Brutus, of the share you allow me in your friendship.

As to what he mentioned concerning the complaints of the veterans, that you and Cæsar are left out of the commission for dividing the lands, I sincerely wish I had, likewise, been excluded from so troublesome an office. But it is by no means to be imputed to me, that you were not both nominated; on the contrary, I moved that all our generals should be included. But the clamours of those who always endeavoured to obstruct your honours, carried it against me; and you were both excepted, in opposition to my warmest efforts. Unheeded then by me, let Segulius propagate his impotent calumnies! For all that the man means is nothing more than to repair his broken fortunes. Not that he can be charged with having dissipated his patrimony; for patrimony he never had. He has only squandered in luxury what he acquired by infamy.

You may be perfectly at ease, my dear and excellent Brutus, with regard to those fears which you so generously entertain upon my account, at the same time that you feel none, you tell me, upon your own. Be assured I shall expose myself to no dangers which prudence can prevent; and, as to those against which no precaution can avail, I am little solicitous. High, indeed, would my presumption be, were I to desire to be privileged beyond the common lot of human nature.

The advice you give me not to suffer my fears to lead me into greater dangers than those they would avoid, supplies me at once with a proof both of your judgment and your friendship; but the caution is altogether unnecessary. The truth of it is, distinguished as you are by a fortitude of mind which renders you incapable of fear upon any occasion, yet there is no man who approaches nearer to you in that quality than myself. Nevertheless, I shall always be upon my guard, though I shall never be afraid. Indeed, if I should have any reason, will it not be wholly owing, my dear Brutus, to yourself? For were I of a disposition apt to take alarm, yet I should be perfectly composed, in the confidence of that protection I shall receive from your approaching consulate; especially as the world is no less sensible than I am of the singular share I enjoy of your affection.

I agree entirely with your opinion concerning the four legions, as also that both you and Cæsar should have the distribution of those estates you mention. This is an office on which some of my colleagues had cast a very wistful eye; however, I have disappointed their longing, by reserving it

LETTER V.

Plancus to Cicero.

I SHALL never regret to undergo the greatest dangers in the cause of my country, provided, my A. U. 710, dear Cicero, that whatever happens to myself, I may not justly be accused of temerity. But I should not scruple to confess that I had been guilty of an imprudence, if I had ever acted in reliance upon the sincerity of Lepidus. Too easy a disposition to give credit to fair pretences, cannot so properly be called a fault as an error: but an error into which the noblest minds are generally most liable to fall. It was not, however, from a mistake of this nature that I had lately well-nigh been deceived: for the character of Lepidus I perfectly well knew. It was entirely owing to a certain sensibility of what my detractors might say: a quality, I will freely acknowledge, particularly prejudicial in the affair of war. I was apprehensive, if I remained in my camp, that those who are inclined to misconstrue my actions, might represent me as the occasion of the war being protracted, by obstinately indulging my resentment against Lepidus: and, therefore, I advanced almost within sight of him and Antony. I encamped, indeed, at no greater distance from them than forty miles, that I might be able, as circumstances should require, either speedily to join the army of Lepidus, or safely to retreat with my own. In marking out my camp, I chose a spot of ground that gave me the advantage of having a large river in my front, which would take up some time in passing, and that lay contiguous, likewise, to the country of the Vocontii<sup>1</sup>: who, I was sure, would favour my retreat. When Lepidus found himself disappointed of what he so much wished, and that there was no hopes of my approaching nearer, he immediately threw off the mask; and on the 29th of May he joined Antony. The combined armies moved the same day in order to invest my camp; and they had actually advanced within twenty miles before I received advice of their junction. However, I struck my tents with so much expedition, that, by the favour of the gods, I had the happiness to escape them. My retreat was conducted with so much good order, that no part of my baggage, nor even a single man, was either left behind or intercepted by these incensed villains. On the 4th of this month I repassed the Isara with my whole army: after which I broke down the bridge I had thrown across that river. I took this precaution, that my troops might have time to refresh themselves, as well as to give my colleague<sup>1</sup> an opportunity of coming up to me: which I imagine he will be able to effect in three days from the date of this letter.

I must always acknowledge the zeal and fidelity which Laterensis has shown to the republic, in his negotiations between Lepidus and myself: but it is certain that his great partiality towards Lepidus prevented him from discerning the dangers into which I have been led. However, as soon as he discovered how grossly he had been imposed upon, he attempted to turn that sword against his own breast, which with much more justice had been plunged in the heart of Lepidus. But he was prevented from completing his purpose: and it is said (though I by no means mention it as a certainty) that the wound he has given himself is not mortal.

My escape from these traitors has proved an extreme mortification to them: as they marched to attack me with the same unrelenting fury which instigates them against their country. Some late circumstances particularly contributed to inflame their resentment. I had frequently and warmly urged Lepidus to extinguish this civil war: I had disapproved of the conferences that were held with the enemy: I had refused to see the lieutenants whom Antony deputed to me under the passports of Lepidus: and had intercepted Cælius Vestinus, whom the former had sent express to the latter. But it is with pleasure I reflect, that the more earnestly they wished to get me into their hands, the more they suffer in the disappointment.

Continue, my dear Cicero, to employ the same vigorous efforts you have hitherto exerted, that we who are in arms, for the defence of the republic, may have suitable honours paid to our services. In the mean time, I wish that Cæsar would join us with those brave troops he commands; or, if his affairs will not permit him, that, at least, they might be sent under the conduct of some other general: for most certainly his own personal interest is at stake<sup>1</sup>. The whole force of the disaffected party is united against our country: and shall we not put forth our utmost strength in its defence? As for what concerns myself, I will venture to assure you, that if you at Rome are not wanting on your parts, I will abundantly perform everything that can be expected on mine.

The obligations I am continually receiving from your hands, endear you to me every day more and more; at the same time that they animate me to act in such a manner as not to forfeit, in any degree, your esteem and affection.

I will only add my wishes, that I were able in person to give you such proofs of my gratitude as might afford you greater reason to rejoice in the good offices you have conferred upon me. Farewell.

tell you the truth", I was once inclined to be somewhat angry at the shortness of your letters: but I am now so well reconciled to your concise manner, that I condemn my own bright loquacity, and shall make your epistles models of mine. How short, yet how lively are you when you tell me, that "all goes well with you, and that you shall endeavour them still better; and that Lepidus is favourably disposed; and that we have nothing to expect from our three armies!" I am ever so full of fears, these significant sentences would banish them all. But I exert the one you recommend; and, indeed, if, at the time you were closely blocked up in Mutina, the others, nevertheless, were fixed entirely upon you, much higher, think you, must they be now?

I should be glad, my dear Brutus, to resign to you the post of observation, if I might do so without incurring the censure of deserting it. As you mentioned of continuing in Italy till I should hear from me, I do not disapprove of motions of the enemy should not call you; as there are many points upon the Rome, which may render it prudent for you to remove to a farther distance. But, at the same time, if your presence here may prove a means of ending the war, it is undoubtedly the first and best scheme you should have in view.

Senate has decreed the first money that should be raised for the payment of your troops. I am extremely your friend; and you may end upon me. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

Asinius Pollio to Cicero.

I, my quæstor, has withdrawn from very considerable effects in his hands, which he had received of the public taxes, consisting of a large quantity of uncoined silver, together with a great sum of money; and what adds to his iniquity is, that he is not discharged even the pay of the army. His flight he was detained three days, at Calpe, from whence, and how, he fled on the 1st of this month, and has transported himself, together with his treasure, into the dominions of Bogud, king of Mauritania. But whether the present prevailing reports will bring him back to Gades or carry him to Rome I know not; for I hear that his resolutions vary with every different express that arrives. But, besides the robberies and the extortions he has committed in this province, and the cruelties he has exercised towards our allies, he affected, in several instances, to imitate (as he himself used to boast) the actions of Cæsar. Accordingly, on the last day of the games which he exhibited at Gades, he presented Herennius Gallus, a comedian, with the golden ring, and conducted him to one of the fourteen benches of the theatre which he had appropriated to those of the equestrian order. He likewise continued himself in the supreme magistracy of Gades by his own single authority, and at two immediately successive assemblies of the people he nominated for the two next following years such of his creatures whom he thought proper to succeed him in the government of that city. He also recalled from exile, not indeed those unfortunate men who were banished on account of the present commotions, but those infamous rebels who were concerned in the sedition which was raised in Gades during the proconsulate of Sextus Varrus, and in which all the members of their council were either assassinated or expelled. Thus far he had Cæsar for his model; but, in the instances I am going to mention, he exceeded even Cæsar himself. He caused a play to be acted at the public games upon the subject of his embassy to Lucius Lentulus, the proconsul; and the good man was so affected with the remembrance of those transactions which the scenes of this drama recalled to his mind, that he melted into tears. At the gladiatorial games, he gave a specimen of his cruelty with regard to one Fadius, who had served in Pompey's army. This man had twice, it seems, voluntarily entered the lists in combats of this kind; but upon the present occasion he refused to fight, though peremptorily required by Balbus, and accordingly threw himself upon the protection of the populace. But the

One of the most considerable kingdoms in ancient Africa, comprehending those of Fez and Morocco, together with part of Algiers and Biledulgerid. Bogud, the prince of this country, had, in the late civil wars, favoured and assisted Cæsar, by whom he had been greatly distinguished, as he afterwards supported Antony in the war between him and Octavius. It is probable, therefore, that Balbus withdrew with these treasures, not in order to convert them to his private use, but to employ them in the cause of Antony.—Hirt. De Bell. Alex. 59; De Bell. Afric. 25.

Concerning the junction of Lepidus with Antony.

It does not appear who this person was, nor at what time he presided as governor of Spain.

He was consul in the year 704, when the civil war broke out, in which he took part with Pompey. He accompanied that general in his retreat to Brundisium, and from thence passed over with him into Greece. But before Lentulus left Italy Balbus was employed by Cæsar (as Manutius observes) to prevail with him to return to Rome. Balbus afterwards (as appears by a passage which the same commentator cites from Paternus) executed a much more difficult commission of this kind, at the siege of Dyrrachium, where he undertook to carry some farther overtures from Cæsar to Lentulus, who was in that garrison, and which he executed with equal address and intrepidity. It was this adventure, it is probable, that formed the subject of the play which Pollio here mentions.—Ad Att. viii. 11; Vell. Pat. ii. 51.

mob having pelted Balbus with stones when he attempted to recover him out of their hands, he let loose upon them a party of his Gallic horse. Balbus having by these means got the unfortunate Fadius into his possession, ordered him to be fixed in a pit which was dug for that purpose in the place where the games were exhibited, and caused him in this manner to be burned alive. This was performed soon after Balbus had dined*, who was present during the whole execution, walking about bare-footed, with his hands behind him and his tunic loose, in the most unconcerned and indecent manner; and while the unhappy sufferer cried out that he was a Roman citizen, "Why do you not run now (said the insulting and relentless Balbus) to implore the protection of the people?" But this was not the single cruelty he exercised. He exposed, likewise, several Roman citizens to wild beasts; particularly a certain noted auctioneer in the city of Hispalis<sup>7</sup>,—and this for no other reason but because the poor man was excessively deformed. Such is the monster with whom I had the misfortune to be connected! But more of him when we meet. In the mean time (to turn to a point of much greater importance) I should be glad the senate would determine in what manner they would have me act. I am at the head of three brave legions, one of which Antony took great pains to draw over to his interest at the commencement of the war. For this purpose he caused it to be signified to them, that the very first day they should enter into his camp every soldier should receive five hundred denarii<sup>2</sup>, besides which, he also assured them that if he obtained the victory they should receive an equal share of the spoils with his own troops; a reward which all the world knows would have been without end or measure. These promises made a deep impression upon them; and it was with great difficulty I kept them from deserting. I should not, indeed, have been able to have effected this if I had not cantoned them in distant quarters,—as some of the cohorts, notwithstanding they were thus separated, had the insolence to mutiny. Antony endeavoured, likewise, to gain the rest of the legions by immense offers. Nor was Lepidus less importunate with me to send him the thirtieth legion, which he solicited both by his own letters and by those which he caused Antony to write. The senate will do me the justice, therefore, to believe, as no advantages could tempt me to sell my troops, nor any dangers which I had reason to apprehend if Antony and Lepidus should prove conquerors, could prevail with me to diminish their number, that I was thus tenacious of my army for no other purpose but to employ it in the service of the republic<sup>a</sup>. And let the readiness with which I have obeyed all the orders I received from the senate be a proof that I would have complied in the same manner with every other they should have thought proper to have sent me. I have preserved the tranquillity of this province, I have maintained my authority over the army, and have never once moved beyond the limits of my own jurisdiction. I must add, likewise, that I have never employed any soldier, either of my own troops or those of my auxiliaries, in carrying any despatches whatsoever; and I have constantly punished such of my cavalry whom I have found at any time attempting to desert. I shall think these cares sufficiently rewarded in seeing the peace and security of the republic restored. But if the majority of the senate, and the commonwealth indeed in general, had known me for what I am, I should have been able to have rendered them much more important services.

* There seems to have been some peculiar indecorum in this circumstance, though it is not very easy to determine wherein it precisely consisted. It may be that public executions, at this time of the day, were thought indecent; it is certain, at least, that it was deemed improper to hold courts of judicature for the trial of criminal matters in an afternoon. For Plutarch takes notice that the younger Cato was accused of this practice during his prætorship, and thinks it necessary, for the credit of that illustrious Roman, to deny the truth of the charge; or, perhaps, Pollio might point out this circumstance as a mark of uncommon cruelty of disposition in Balbus, who could rise from table with a temper of mind so different from that which pleasures of this sort are naturally apt to inspire, and turn from a cheerful meal to a scene of the utmost horror and barbarity.—Plut. in Vit. Caton. Uticen.

I have sent you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Balbus just before he left this province; and if you have any curiosity to read his play, which I mentioned above, it is in the hands of my friend Gallus Cornelius, to whom you may apply for it. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Plancius.

ALL our hopes are entirely fixed (and fixed, too, with the approbation of the gods themselves) upon A. U. 710. you and your colleague<sup>b</sup>. The perfect unanimity, therefore, that appears, by your several letters to the senate, to subsist between you, affords great satisfaction, not only to that assembly in particular, but to the whole city in general.

As to what you wrote to me concerning the commission for dividing the lands, if that affair had been brought before the senate I should have been the first to have proposed the most honourable decree in your favour. But the slowness of their deliberations in the business which was then under their consideration, together with other obstructions which attended their debates, having prevented them from coming to any resolution, both your brother and myself were of opinion that it was most advisable to proceed upon the former decree; and I take it for granted that he has acquainted you to whom it is owing that it was not drawn up in the manner we proposed. But if, in this instance or in any other, your inclinations should not be entirely gratified, be well persuaded, however, that you are in such high esteem with all the friends of the republic that there is no sort of honours they are not disposed to confer upon you. I wait with great impatience for an express from you, as I expect it will bring us the news I most wish. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Cornificius.

it really so, my friend; and have I never mented the cause of some litigious suitor?

I confess I have frequently troubled you with letters of this kind; but must you not thank my own obliging partiality towards me, if the is persuaded that no recommendation has so weight with you as mine? Tell me, however, did I omit writing, if your family gave me of an opportunity? In fact, nothing affords me greater satisfaction, now that I cannot converse with you in person, than this intercourse of letters.
 I am aware that my public occupations prevent my corresponding with you as frequently as I wish. If I had more leisure, indeed, I should not have failed to enter with me into a communication of this epistolary kind, but I should challenge you with whole volumes of my works; a work which I ought to have received from your engagements, I imagine, are not so numerous as mine. But if I am in this supposition, how shall I acquit myself a little unreasonable, in expecting letters on my part, when you have so sure to send me any on yours? If I have been engaged in the most important business, as holding myself bound to exert all to the defence of the republic, I may still urge that plea at present. For as always more dangerous than a first spark, the rekindling of this war, after it was fully extinguished, demands a double labour and vigilance. But, not to enter into this subject, believe me, my dear friend, I should think myself most inexcusably to say ill-mannered, were I capable of you to gain the superiority over me in of friendship. That I enjoy yours, is which I never once had the least doubt:
 sensation I have lately had with Cherip-erus it still more evident. As agreements was to my taste, I could not but see, in his last visit, with more than care, as he not only acquainted me with the contents of your heart, in the message he gave me, but, as he represented, at the lively image of your very air and countenance. You had no reason then to be appalled; I should be displeased at your the same common letter which you sent your friends in general. If I describe an particular memorial, it was merely on of my heart, and by no means as which I insisted.

With our consuls<sup>1</sup>, together with the treasury of money in the treasury, puts

I am persuaded there is no truth in the report concerning Attius Dionysius: as Stratorius has not mentioned a word to me upon that subject.
 With regard to Publius Luccius: he well persuaded that his interest is no less my concern than it is yours: for, indeed, he is extremely my friend.
 I could not, however, prevail with the managers of the auction to adjourn the sale; their engagements and their oath oblige them, they assure me, to the contrary. I would by all means, therefore, advise him to hasten into Italy: and if the summons I sent him some time since had any weight, he will be at Rome when you read this letter. As to the affairs you mention, and particularly the money, I find you were not apprised of Pansa's death when you wrote your letter, by the hopes you express that, through my interest, he would comply with your request. And most undoubtedly he would, had he been living; for he held you in great esteem. But as he is dead, I do not see that anything can now be done in this matter.

I approve, in general, of your measures with respect to Venullius, Latinus, and Horatius: and particularly, that you have deprived them of their lictors. But I am not altogether so well pleased, that, in order to render this circumstance the less uneasy to them, you have taken away these attendants likewise from your own lieutenants. Those who deserve the highest honours ought not to have been thus levelled with a set of men, who certainly merit the utmost disgrace: and if they will not depart from your province, in obedience to the decree of the senate, I think you should use compulsory methods for that purpose.

I have nothing farther to add in answer to your last letter (of which I received a duplicate) but that I hope you will be persuaded, your credit and reputation are no less sacred to me than my own.
 Farewell.

LETTER X.

To Decimus Brutus.

THOUGH I always receive your letters with the highest satisfaction, yet I am much better pleased with you, that you employed your colleague Plancus to make an excuse to me, than if you had interrupted your very important occupations by writing yourself. He has executed your commission very fully: and nothing can render your character more truly amiable to me, than the account he gives of your zeal and diligence.

The junction of your forces with those of Plancus, and the harmony with which you act together, as appears by your common letter to the senate, was extremely agreeable, both to that assembly, and to the people in general. What remains then, each man's substance, but had wholly been dissipated in Rome from the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus Æmilius, which furnished money and rents sufficient to ease the city ever after of that burthen, till the necessity of the present times obliged them to renew it."—Val. Max. iv. 3; Life of Cicero, p. 283.

<sup>1</sup> This letter closes the correspondence between Cicero and Cornificius. The latter, not long afterwards, lost his life in bravely defending his province against the troops of Sextus, who claimed it in the name of Octavius, by virtue of the general division of the Roman dominions that had been agreed upon between the triumvirs.—Appian. De Bell. Civ. p. 620.

my dear Brutus, but to conjure you to persevere in the same unanimity, and to endeavour, I will not say to excel others, but (what is far worthier of your ambition) to rise above yourself? I need add no more: especially as I am writing to one whose epistolary conciseness I purpose to imitate.

I wait with impatience for your next despatches, as I imagine they will bring us such accounts as are agreeable to our wishes. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

To Furnius.

WHEN your letter assured me that it was absolutely necessary either to slight Narbonensian A. U. 710. Gaul<sup>b</sup>, or to attack the enemy with great disadvantage, I was glad to find that the former had been chosen: as I much more dreaded the consequences of coming to an engagement upon unequal terms. What you mentioned likewise concerning the harmony between Plancus and Brutus, afforded me great pleasure; for it is a circumstance upon which I found my principal hopes of our success.

Notwithstanding you modestly refer it to time to inform me to whom we owe that general zeal which appears in your province<sup>c</sup>; be assured it is a point of which I am already perfectly well apprised. I could not, therefore, but read the latter part of your letter, which, in all other respects, was extremely agreeable to me, with some concern. You there tell me, that if the election for ædiles is fixed for the month of August, you will soon be at Rome; but if it is already over, you will be there much sooner: "for wherefore," you ask, "should you weakly continue to hazard your life, without the prospect of any recompense?" O! my friend, is it possible that you, who judge so well concerning the interests of others, should be thus a stranger to your own? But, as I am sensible of the strong impulse of your heart towards true glory, I cannot believe that these are its genuine sentiments; at least, if they be, I must condemn my own judgment as well as yours, for being so greatly deceived in your character. Shall the ambition of anticipating a slight and common honour, (for so I must call the office you have in view, if obtained in the manner by which so many others have risen to it before you,) induce you to withdraw from a theatre where you are acting with such universal and well-merited applause? Shall it be a question with you, whether to offer yourself as a candidate now, or at the next election for prætors; and is it none, how you shall deserve every illustrious distinction which the commonwealth can bestow? Are you a stranger to the exalted reputation you have acquired? Or do you consider it as of no value, thus to rise in the esteem of your country? If you are ignorant, indeed, of the high credit in which you stand with the public, it is an ignorance for which we, who are your friends, are undoubtedly to be blamed. But if you already know it, tell me, my Furnius, can any prætorship afford you a satisfaction superior to what you feel in discharging the duty you owe to your country, and in reaping immortal glory? an acquisition which, though few indeed endeavour to deserve, yet every man most certainly wishes to enjoy. Calvisius, who is much your friend, and a man of great judgment also, frequently joins with me in complaining of you upon this article. However, since you are so desirous to attain this office, I shall endeavour that the election may be deferred till the month of January; as this adjournment will, upon many accounts I think, prove for the advantage likewise of the republic. Farewell: and may victory attend you!

LETTER XII.

To Caius Cassius.

I IMAGINE you are informed, by the public journals, which I know are duly transmitted to A. U. 710. you, of the infamous conduct of that most light and inconstant man, your relation Lepidus<sup>d</sup>. We are again, therefore, involved in a war, which we flattered ourselves was entirely over; and all our hopes are now placed upon Decimus<sup>e</sup> and Plancus; or, to speak more truly indeed, upon Brutus<sup>f</sup> and upon you. For it is from you two that we expect, not only a present assistance, in case any misfortune (which the gods avert!) should attend our arms, but a firm and lasting re-establishment of our liberties.

The reports in regard to Dolabella<sup>g</sup>, are, in all respects, agreeable to our wishes, excepting only that they want confirmation. In the mean time, be assured, that the opinion and expectations of the world concerning you, are such as evidently show that they look upon you as a truly great man. Let this animate you to the noblest achievements, in the full persuasion that there is nothing so considerable which your country does not hope to obtain by your courage and conduct. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To the same.

I TAKE example from the conciseness of your letters, to shorten mine: though, to say truth, A. U. 710. nothing occurs at present that can tempt me to lengthen them. For, as to our transactions, I well know you are acquainted with them by the public journals; and we are perfectly ignorant of everything that concerns yours. One would imagine, indeed, that all communications were cut off between us and Asia: for we have received no intelligence from thence, excepting only some uncertain, though indeed repeated, rumours in relation to the defeat of Dolabella.

We imagined that the flames of this civil war were entirely extinguished; but, in the midst of this pleasing persuasion, we were suddenly and greatly alarmed by the conduct of your relation Lepidus. Be assured, therefore, that the hopes of the republic are wholly fixed upon you and your army. We have, it is true, a very powerful body of troops in this part of the world; nevertheless, your presence here is extremely necessary, to give our affairs all the success we wish. I will not say that we have no hopes of recovering our liberties ; but I must say our hopes are small. Such as they are, however, they are entirely founded upon your future consulate". Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

THE preservation of the republic, by the victory we have lately obtained, gives me inexpressible joy, as the honours that have been paid my friend<sup>s</sup> afford me likewise a very sensible pleasure. I cannot sufficiently indulge my admiration, when I consider you as thus rising above yourself in glory, and that the consular<sup>s</sup> would shine forth even with more lustre than the usual. Some uncommon privilege of fate most mainly attends your patriot virtues, as we have ten I am sure experienced. How else should our single eloquence be of more avail than the us of all our generals? You have a second time, indeed, rescued the well-nigh vanquished republic from the hands of our enemies, and once more rescued her to us again. From this period, therefore, I date the return of our liberties, and I shall not be honoured with the public applause of the most distinguished of patriots. Yes, my friend, I will now declare, (what you promised to conceal till the recovery of our freedom should render to my advantage to be known,) you will now declare to the whole world those instances you received by tender attachment both to you and to the public, during the dark and dangerous season of servitude. I am much less solicitous, however, you should publish my praises, than that you should be persuaded I deserve them; and I had ever stand approved by your silent judgment, without that internal verdict in my favour, to you, by your recommendation, the good opinion of the whole world. It is my great ambition, indeed, that you should esteem my late conduct to be, not the effect of a sudden and irregular impulse, but the natural result of the same uniform principles of which you have been a witness : in a word, that you should think of me, as of one from whom the republic has so much to expect, as may well justify every honour to which I shall be advanced. I am sensible, my dear Cicero, that your own family, as they are well worthy of the relation they bear to you, deserve your first and most tender regard. But those surely have a right to the next place in your affection who endeavour to imitate your patriot virtues : and I shall be glad to find that their number is considerable. I imagine, however, that it is not so great as to exclude me from a share in your good offices, and prevent you from procuring any public distinctions in my favour which shall be agreeable to your inclination and your judgment. That I am not unworthy of them, with respect to the disposition of my heart, I have already, perhaps, sufficiently convinced you : and, as to my talents, whatever they may be, the general oppression under which our country so long laboured, would not suffer them to appear in their full advantage.

I drew together, out of the ports of this Asiatic province, and of the neighbouring islands, all the ships of war I could possibly collect : and, considering the great opposition I met with from the several cities, I manned them with tolerable expedition. With this fleet I pursued that of Dolabella, commanded by Lucilius ; who, after having frequently made a show of coming over to me, but still, however, continuing to retreat, sailed, at length, into the port of Corycus* ; where he blocked himself up. I did not think proper to follow him thither ; not only as judging it most advisable to join our land forces, but as Turullius the quæstor lay behind me with a squadron which Tullius Cimber fitted out the last year from Bithynia. I put in, therefore, at Cyprus ; from whence I take this first opportunity of acquainting you with the intelligence I have here received. I am to inform you then, that the city of Laodicea (in pursuance of the example of our faithless allies the Tarsenses†, though, indeed, with a greater degree of folly) have voluntarily called in Dolabella. From those two cities he has composed an army (as far as numbers can make an army) of Greek soldiers, and is encamped before Laodicea ; having thrown down part of the walls, in order to join his camp with the town. On the other hand, Cassius‡ is encamped, about twenty miles distant from him, at Paltos. His army consists of ten legions, and twenty auxiliary cohorts, together with four thousand horse. He imagines that he shall be able to oblige the enemy to surrender, without hazarding a battle ; as wheat is so scarce in Dolabella's camp, that it is sold for twelve drachmæ. The enemy must necessarily, indeed, be destroyed by famine, if they are not soon supplied by the ships that belong to Laodicea. This, however, we shall with great ease prevent ; for, besides the three squadrons under Turullius, Patiscus, and myself, Cassius has a considerable fleet in these seas commanded by Sextilius Rufus. Let me encourage you, then, to hope, that we shall soon vindicate our liberties with the same success§ in this part of the world, as has attended your army in Italy. Farewell.

seems to allude to the honours that were paid to by the populace, upon the news that Antony had ceased to abandon the siege of Mutina. "The whole the people (to give the relation of this fact in the Dr. Middleton) assembled about Cicero's house, tried him in a kind of triumph to the capitol ; on their return, they placed him in the rostra, to an account of the victory, and then conducted us with infinite acclamations."—Philipp. xiv. 5 ; Cicero, p. 371.

LETTER XV.

To Decimus Brutus.

I WAS expecting every day to hear from you, when our friend Lupus gave me notice that he was A. U. 710. just setting out to you, and desired to know if I had anything to write. But though I have nothing worth communicating more than what you are furnished with by the public journals, and that you are no friend I am told to letters of mere empty form, yet I cannot forbear following your example, and sending you two or three short words. Be assured, then, that all our hopes rest upon you and your colleague<sup>v</sup>. As to Brutus<sup>w</sup>, I am not able to give you any certain account of him: I can only say, that, in pursuance of your advice, I endeavour to persuade him, in all my letters, to come over into Italy, and to take a part in this general war<sup>x</sup>. I much wish he were now here, as his presence would render me less apprehensive of the consequences of these intestine commotions<sup>y</sup> which prevail in Rome; and which are by no means indeed inconsiderable.—But I forget that I proposed to imitate your laconic brevity, and am running on in a second page. Farewell then, and may success attend your arms<sup>z</sup>.

LETTER XVI.

To Caius Cassius.

YOUR relation and my friend, the worthy Lepidus, together with all his adherents, were, by a unanimous decree of the senate, which A. U. 710. passed on the 30th of June last, declared public enemies to their country: but at the same

<sup>x</sup> The conduct of Marcus Brutus, as far as can be judged of it at this great distance, appears altogether unaccountable. Before the battle of Mutina he had drawn down all his forces to the coast, in order to embark for Italy, if any accident should make his assistance necessary. But, upon the news of Antony's defeat, he retired to the remotest parts of Greece and Macedonia, to oppose the attempts of Dolabella; and from that time (as Dr. Middleton observes) seemed deaf to the call of the senate, and to all Cicero's letters, which urged him so strongly to come to their relief. But had Brutus and Cassius (as the same ingenious historian remarks) marched with their armies towards Italy, at the time when Cicero first pressed it, before the desertion of Plancus and the death of Decimus, it seems reasonable to believe that the immediate ruin of the republic might have been prevented.—Life of Cicero, p. 282.

<sup>y</sup> The disturbances to which Cicero alludes were, probably, those that were occasioned by the violent measures of Octavius, in order to obtain the consulate.—See rem. <sup>1</sup> on letter 18 of this book.

<sup>z</sup> Decimus Brutus, soon after the date of this letter, was most treacherously deserted by Plancus, who drew off his troops from those of his colleague, and went over with them to the camp of Antony and Lepidus. "Decimus Brutus being thus abandoned, and left to shift for himself, with a needy mutinous army, eager to desert, and ready to give him up to his enemies, had no other way to save himself than by flying to Marcus Brutus in Macedonia. But the distance was so great, and the country so guarded, that he was often forced to change his road for fear of being taken; till, having dismissed all his attendants, and wandered for some time alone in disguise and distress, he committed himself to the protection of an old acquaintance and host, whom he had formerly obliged, where, either through treachery or accident, he was surprised by Antony's soldiers, who immediately killed him, and returned time a full pardon was offered to such as shall return to their allegiance before the first of September. The senate acts with great spirit; but it is the expectation of being supported by your army, that chiefly animates them in their rigorous measures. I fear, indeed, that we shall have occasion for all your assistance, as the war is now become extremely formidable by the villany of Lepidus.

The accounts which daily arrive concerning Dolabella are altogether agreeable to our wishes: but, at present, they are nothing more than mere rumours. However, your letter addressed to the senate, dated from the camp on the 9th of May, has raised a general persuasion in Rome, that he is actually defeated. Accordingly, it is imagined, that you are now upon your march into Italy, with a view, on the one hand, of succouring as with your troops, if any of those accidents so common in war should have rendered our arms unsuccessful; or, on the other hand, of assisting us with your counsels and authority, in case we should have proved victorious. You may be assured, in the mean while, that no endeavours of mine shall be wanting to procure the forces under your command all possible honours. However, I must wait a proper season for this purpose, when it shall be known how far they have availed, or are likely to avail, the republic. At present, we have only heard of these endeavours in the cause of liberty; and glorious, it must be acknowledged, their endeavours have been. But still some positive services are expected; and these expectations, I dare be confident, either already are, or soon will be, perfectly answered. No man, indeed, possesses a more patriot or heroic spirit than yourself: and it is for this reason that we wish to see you in Italy as soon as possible. The fact is, if you and Brutus were here, we should look upon the republic as restored.

If Lepidus had not received Antony, weak and defenceless as he was, when he fled after the battle of Mutina, we should have obtained a complete victory. This infamous step, therefore, has rendered him far more odious in Rome even than Antony himself ever was: for Antony raised a war at a time when the republic was in the utmost ferment; whereas Lepidus has kindled the flames in the midst of peace and victory. We have the consuls elect<sup>1</sup> to lead our armies against him; but though we greatly depend upon their courage and conduct, still however the uncertain event of war leaves us much to fear. Be assured therefore that our principal reliance is upon you and Brutus, whom we hope soon to see in Italy; and Brutus, indeed, we expect every day. Should we have defeated our enemies as I hope we shall, before your arrival, the utility, nevertheless, of two such illustrious citizens will be of infinite service in raising up the republic and fixing it upon some tolerable basis. All our business, indeed, will by no means be over, notwithstanding we should be delivered from the infamous designs of our enemies,—as there are many other disorders of a different kind, which it will be still necessary to redress. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Amplus.

YOUR family has informed you, I imagine, of my zealous labours to procure your restoration, as a. c. 710. I have the pleasure to be assured that they are abundantly satisfied with my services. Uncommon, indeed, as the affection is which they every one of them bear towards you, yet I cannot allow that they are more sincerely desirous of your welfare than myself. I am sure, at least, their power of assisting you in this conjuncture is by no means equal to mine. I have employed it, and shall continue to employ it, for your benefit: and I have already gained a very considerable point, which will much contribute to facilitate your return. In the meanwhile, preserve a firm and manly spirit, and be well persuaded that my good offices shall not be wanting to you upon any occasion. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

Plancus, Consul elect, to Cicero.

I CANNOT forbear to express, upon every occasion, the sentiments I entertain of your repeated favours; though, at the same time, it is with some reserve that I indulge myself in this satisfaction. The great intimacy, indeed, which you allow me to enjoy with you, renders all formal acknowledgments of this kind unnecessary; nor would I make so cheap a return to the many important obligations I owe to you, as that of mere empty professions. I had much rather reserve the proofs of my gratitude to some future opportunity of testifying it in person; and, if I live, I will convince you, by the assiduity of my good offices, and by every instance of respect and esteem, that you have not a friend, nor even a relation, who is so warmly attached to you as myself. In the mean time, I am at a loss to determine, whether the daily pleasure I receive, or the lasting honour I shall derive, from your affectionate regard, be greater.

I find the interest of my troops has been a part of your care. It was not with any intention of advancing my own power, that I was desirous they should be distinguished by the senate, as I am conscious of having no views but what regard the welfare of the republic. My reasons were, in the first place, because I thought they deserved to be rewarded; and, in the next place, because I was desirous they might, upon all occasions, be still more attached to the commonwealth. I hoped, likewise, by these means, so strongly to fortify me against all solicitations, that I might be more valuable for their continuing to act with the unshaken fidelity which they have hitherto served.

I have kept entirely upon the defensive; and, though I am well apprised with how much justice the public wishes for a decisive action, I persuade myself that the senate will approve my conduct. If any misfortune, indeed, should add our armies in this part of the world, the public would not very soon be in a condition to oppose any sudden incursion of these rapacious traitors. As to the state of our forces, I imagine you already know that those under my command consist of three veteran legions, together with one new-raised regiment, which last, however, is composed of far the best-disciplined troops I ever saw of this sort. Brutus<sup>c</sup> is at the head of ten legions, one of which is veteran, another has been upon the establishment about two years, and all the rest are lately raised. Thus, you see, though our army is very numerous, it is not extremely strong. The republic, indeed, has but too often had occasion to be convinced how little is to be expected from raw and unexperienced forces. However, if we had been joined either by the African legions<sup>d</sup>, which are composed wholly of veteran troops, or by Cæsar's<sup>e</sup>, we should, without hesitation, have hazarded a general engagement. As the troops of the latter were somewhat nearer than the former, I frequently pressed Cæsar, by letters, to advance; and he accordingly promised to join us with all expedition. But other views, I perceive, have diverted him from these intentions. Nevertheless, I have despatched my lieutenant, Furnius, with another letter to him, if happily it may anything avail. You are sensible, my dear Cicero, that I take an equal part with you in the affection you bear to Octavius. He has a right to my friendship, not only from that intimacy which I enjoyed with his uncle<sup>f</sup>; but, in regard also to his own disposition, which, as far I could ever discover, is regulated by principles of great moderation and humanity. It would ill indeed become that distinguished amity, which subsisted between Julius Cæsar and myself, not to look upon Octavius with all the tenderness which is due to the son of my friend, after he has been adopted as such by Cæsar's will, and that adoption approved by the senate. What I am going to say, therefore, is more the dictates of concern than resentment; but it must be acknowledged, that if Antony still lives, if he has been joined by Lepidus, if their armies are by no means contemptible; in a word, all their hopes and all their attempts are singly owing to Cæsar's<sup>g</sup>. Not to look farther back than to his promise of joining me: had he fulfilled the assurances he gave me for that purpose, the war would, by this time, either have been totally at an end, or driven into Spain, where the enemy could not have carried it on without great disadvantage, as that province is utterly averse to them. I am at a loss to conceive, therefore, with what view, or by whose advice, Cæsar was diverted from a measure so greatly to his interest and his honour, in order to turn his pursuits towards a consulship of a few months' duration<sup>h</sup>: much to the terror, at the same time, of the republic<sup>i</sup>; and with preten-sions, too, exceedingly ridiculous<sup>1</sup>. The remonstrances of his friends might be extremely serviceable upon this occasion, both to himself and to the commonwealth. But none of them, I am persuaded, would have so much influence over him as yours<sup>2</sup>; as there is no man who is so much obliged to you except myself: for I shall ever acknowledge that the favours I have received from you are great and innumerable. I have given instructions to Furnius to solicit Cæsar upon this subject: and if I should have that authority with him which I am sure I ought, he will hereafter thank me for my advice. In the mean time, we have a very difficult part to sustain here: as, on city into the utmost consternation and disorder.—Dio, p. 319; Appian, p. 585-6.

<sup>2</sup> Plancus chose a very improper man to dissuade Octavius from pursuing his design upon the consulate, when he fixed upon Cicero as the most likely person to prevail with him for that purpose. It appears, indeed, that Octavius had artfully ensnared Cicero to enter into his views, by persuading him that he was desirous of having him for his colleague in the consular office, and promising to leave the sole administration of it to Cicero's superior wisdom and experience. The bait was too well adapted to his vanity and ambition, to be thrown out in vain, and Cicero undertook the management of this affair upon the terms proposed. Plutarch, Appian, and Dion Cassius, all concur in giving testimony to the truth of this fact; but, as it is a fact which proves that Cicero was by no means at this juncture acting the part of a patriot, the polite apologist of his conduct has endeavoured to discredit the evidence of these historians. To this end Dr. Middleton produces the following passage from the letters to Brutus, as an incontestable proof, "that no man was more shocked at Octavius's attempt, or took more pains to dissuade it, than Cicero."—"Cæsarem—improbabilis litteris quidam fallacibusque nunciis impulerunt in spem certissimam consulatus. Quod simul atque sensi, neque ego illum absentem litteris monere destiti, nec accusare presentes ejus necessarios, qui ejus cupiditati suffragari videbantur; nec in senatu, sceleratissimorum consiliorum fontes aperire dubitavi." [Epist. ad Brut. 10.] Now, there seems to be the strongest reason to question either the authenticity or the veracity of this letter; because it is most certain, from one of Cicero's Philippics, that he actually did favour the earliest possible promotion of Octavius to the consulate. "Quid est enim P. C. (says he) cur eum (Octavium) non quam primum amplissimos honores capere cupiamus? Legibus enim annalibus cum grandiorum ætatem ad consulatum constituiebant, adolescentie temeritatem verebantur. C. Cæsar inempte ætate docuit ab excellenti eximique virtute, progressum ætatis expectari non oportere. In hoc spes libertatis posita est; ab hoc accepta jam salus, hulo summi honores et exquirunt et parati sunt."—[Philipp. v. 17, 18.] Could Cicero, after this, without being guilty of the wildest and the weakest inconsistency, the one hand, we do not think ourselves altogether strong enough to hazard an engagement: and, on the other, must take care not to expose the republic to greater dangers by declining one. However, if Cæsar could comply with the dictates of his interest and his honour, or if the African legions should speedily join us, you may depend upon having nothing to fear from this quarter. Let me entreat you to continue your friendship to me, and to be assured that I am entirely yours. Farewell.

From my camp, July the 98th.

"admonish Octavius by letter against his design upon the consulship, reproach those to their face who encouraged him in that ambitious view, and lay open the source of these traitorous counsels 'in the senate,' (all which the epistle in question affirms that he did,) when he had himself, in the speech and in the passage above cited, and everything that his wit and eloquence could suggest in favour of Octavius's premature advancement to the consular office? Either the letters, then, to Brutus are not genuine, or Cicero, to serve a present purpose, pretended that he had acted a part which he did not. The former of these suppositions is maintained by some very learned and judicious critics, and the latter will by no means be thought improbable, if there is any weight in the several instances of the same kind which have been occasionally produced in the course of these remarks. But whichever of these alternatives be the fact, it equally concludes in support of that historical evidence for which I have been contending. In farther confirmation of which it may be observed, that Plutarch cites the authority of Octavius himself for what he affirms concerning the private agreement between Octavius and Cicero in regard to the consulate. And it is probable he took this piece of secret history from the memoirs which Octavius wrote of his own life, as it is certain that both Plutarch and Appian made great use of them in compiling their histories.—Plut. in Vit. Cæs. Appian, p. 578-9, 385; Dio, p. 519; Middleton on the Epist. to Brut. p. 134, rem. 8; Tunstall's Observ. on the Epist. to Brut. p. 222, et Suet. in Vit. Aug. 85.

<sup>1</sup> Plancus, soon after the date of this letter, abandoning his colleague Decimus Brutus, and went over with his troops to Antony and Lepidus. [See rem. on letter 15 of this book.] About four months, likewise, from the time when this letter was written, the celebrated coalition was formed between Cæsar, Antony, and Lepidus, in consequence of which Cicero, it is well known, was sacrificed to Antony's resentment. In the last moments of his life he behaved with great composure; and it is the only circumstance in all his misfortunes that he bore with becoming fortitude. He had, indeed, so much the less reason to complain of his fate, as it is certain that he suffered nothing more than he would have inflicted, had Fortune put Antony into his power. "Omanium adversarum," (says Livy) nihil ut viro dignum erat, tulit, præter mentem: quæ, vere æstimanti, minus indigne videri potest, quod a victore inimico nihil crudelius passurus erat, quam quod ejusdem fortune compos ipse fecisset." [Liv. Fragm. apud Senec. Suasor. 6.] This is the judgment which the noblest and most impartial of the Roman historians has passed upon Cicero, and the truth of it is abundantly confirmed by the foregoing letters.

OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS, IN SIXTEEN BOOKS.

TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH, WITH NOTES,
BY WILLIAM HEBERDEN, M.D. F.R.S.

TO THE HONORABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND SHUTE BARRINGTON, LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM, &c. &c.

My Lord,

In availing myself of your Lordship's permission to inscribe to you the following Letters, I shall not offend your modesty by any attempt to proclaim to the world what the world everywhere acknowledges—your Lordship's eminent virtues. I shall be content if I can hide some part of my own deficiency in the splendor of so great and good a name.

Your Lordship is well acquainted with the originals from which the following translation is drawn. But while all familiar letters must be liable to obscurity in proportion to our ignorance of the persons and circumstances, often of little notoriety, to which they allude; much more is it to be expected, that in a correspondence entertained at so remote a period, where there exist no remains of the letters on one side, and not unfrequently no record of the particulars which form their subject, many difficulties should present themselves, independent of those which are inseparable from customs and language long since gone into disuse. It is therefore no idle task to render documents, at once so curious and instructive, more extensively useful, by making them more generally understood. For whether we consider the matter or the manner of these letters, their author, or the time when they were written, they constitute in every point of view one of the most precious remains of antiquity. Cicero, as your Lordship knows, was not only the greatest orator of Rome; he was at the same time one of her wisest counsellors, and one of her best citizens. To good natural parts he had added incredible industry, and had made himself master of all the literature and philosophy of the Greeks, then considered as the only source, and, exclusively of revelation, still the brightest source, of good taste and right judgment. But while the learning of the Greek sophist was often suffered to waste itself in fruitless speculation or self-conceit, Cicero's, on the contrary, appears to have been constantly directed to the purposes of useful life, adding strength and grace to the manly powers of his mind. It regulated his judgment, and animated his exertions in the forum and in the senate, in the various and important offices which he executed with singular diligence in the republic, and likewise in the discharge of those gentler duties of courtesy and friendship, to which he seems never to have been inattentive. For so occupied was his whole life, that it may well excite our wonder how he found time to write, or to read, even a portion of those works which he composed and studied. His conduct in the height of his power, during his consulship, is universally known, as well from contemporary histories as from his own orations, which yet remain an illustrious monument of his prudence, of his diligence, of his eloquence. His administration of a provincial government is not less distinguished, and is collected chiefly from the evidence of these letters. It appears to have been every way judicious and upright, and worthy of his high character. For in a situation where other governors, removed from the danger of immediate observation, and unrestrained by the sanctions of a pure religion, had too generally given a loose to rapine, extortion, and violence, and had sacrificed honour, conscience, duty, every ornament and every virtue, at the shrine of ambition and varice, Cicero stands almost a single instance of unshaken justice, patriotism, and moral excellence.

But it would be tedious and impertinent to your Lordship to attempt to enumerate all the particulars that made up the life of this extraordinary man. Our business is with his Letters. And it is difficult to conceive by memorials more worthy of regard than the genuine letters of such a person, addressed to a most intimate friend, to whom he opened his bosom upon all occasions without reserve, who, as he says himself, was "his sociate in public affairs, his confidant in all private ones, and admitted to all his conversation and thoughts." They present an undisguised account of his own sentiments and feelings under a great variety of circumstances, and his opinions upon almost all the great events and great men of his time. How highly they were valued by his countrymen, we learn from the testimony of Cornelius Nepos, who mentions "the sixteen books of his letters to Atticus, from the time of his consulship to his death;" and adds, that "whoever should read them would little need any other history of those times, everything being so clearly described respecting the zeal of parties, the vices of the leading men, and the changes of the republic, that nothing remains untraced. And his wisdom," says he, "may well be thought to have something of divine inspiration; for Cicero not only foretold what took place during his own life, but also what we now experience he announced like a prophet." To Englishmen they derive an additional interest, from breathing everywhere a rational love of liberty, and dread of tyranny, called forth by the peculiar crisis in which the republic was placed, when it was about to sink for ever under the yoke of despotism. To Christians they afford occasion to cherish with more fervent gratitude those consolations and hopes of revelation, that "anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast;" from want of which we see the wisest of the heathen world become a prey to temporal calamities, and overwhelmed with despair.

Qui et in publica re socius, et in privatis omnibus consocius, et omnium sermonum et consiliorum particeps.

Besides the contents of these letters, the style of their composition is itself deservedly an object of admiration; a style free from all pedantry and affectation, from all levity and impertinence, perfectly easy and familiar, yet everywhere consistent with dignity and good manners; or in the words of Cicero himself, when speaking of Atticus, "the language is chaste, interspersed with polite wit, and distinguished by marks of affection." But these very excellences, while they enhance the value of the original letters, add in no small degree to the difficulty of a just translation. It has been my endeavour, in the first place, to give the true sense of the author; then to give it as little altered from the original as the different genius of the languages would permit; to preserve as much as possible of the Roman air, without destroying that ease which gives to epistolary correspondence its best grace; not attempting to modernise terms of civility, or to disguise old customs under new habits, but wishing rather to familiarise the reader with ancient Rome. For I considered that these letters ought to appear, not as if Cicero had written in this age and country, but as if English had been the language of Italy in his time, so that the sentiments and manners might still be Roman, the medium only changed through which they are expressed. To the letters I have added notes, which I have studied to make as few, as short, and as clear as I could, consistently with the object of rendering more easily intelligible, not only to the English reader, but to the scholar, the frequent allusions, the hints, and broken sentences which occur. And though they have not been drawn up without considerable pains in perusing and weighing the opinions of different commentators, yet I have generally thought it best to give simply my own judgment, without embarrassing the reader with my reasons.

I know not if any apology be required for having given the names of people with their Latin terminations. For what can be more absurd than an attempt to translate a mere personal designation? I have not scrupled, therefore, to write Pompeius, Antonius, &c. And it may reasonably be expected that the public taste, which is daily improving, will before long adopt this alteration from the present practice. If I have not always followed the same rule in regard to the names of places, it is because countries belonging equally to all times seem not improperly to partake of the same changes which obtain in the appellations of other common objects. While, therefore, I have preserved the names of persons unchanged, I trust I shall not be chargeable with inconsistency in adopting the English terms of Rome, Italy, and other places familiarly known in modern language.

But I have done. I have perhaps already trespassed upon your patience longer than I ought, were it not that under the cover of your Lordship's name I considered myself in some measure as addressing the public. It only remains that I thank your Lordship for affording me this public opportunity of acknowledging my deep sense of the great and undeviating kindness with which you have honoured me from a very early period of my life, and which derived originally, among many other blessings, from my dear and respected father, your Lordship has permitted to grow up with my growth into familiarity and friendship. I have the honour to be, with great gratitude, esteem, and affection,

My Lord, your Lordship's most obedient and faithful servant,

BOOK I.

LETTER I<sup>a</sup>.

(Being the fifth in Grævius's edition.)

You, who know me so well, may easily conceive what distress I have felt, and what a severe loss I have sustained, both in my public and domestic concerns, by the death of my relation<sup>b</sup> Lucius. For I possessed all the engaging qualities which can arise from kindness and gentleness of manners. And I doubt not that you partake in this affliction, both from your regard to me, and because you have yourself lost in him a most accomplished companion and friend, who was attached to you as well as his own inclination as by my frequent mention of you. As to what you say about your sister, she will be my witness how much pains I have taken to reconcile my brother Quintus to her<sup>c</sup>. For, as

It is obvious that the best arrangement of any series of letters must be that of their dates. I have therefore scrupled to adopt this order in regard to the first ten letters of this book, which are generally acknowledged to have been very early misplaced. At the same time, to avoid any inconvenience that might arise from it, here, here and elsewhere, as often as the same liberty has been taken, subjoined the number of each letter as it stands in Grævius's edition. This first, in the order of which was written in the 68th year of Rome, corresponds to the 68th year before Christ, when Cicero was thirty-years old.

Lucius Cicero was cousin-german to Marcus; the term frater, like the Greek ἀδελφός, being subject to considerable latitude of signification. See book II. letter 7, note r. Quintus Cicero, the younger brother of Marcus, had a sister Pomponia, Atticus's sister.

I thought him unreasonably offended, I wrote to him in such a manner as might soothe a brother, and admonish one who was my junior, and reprove one who was in the wrong. And by the letters which I have since frequently received from him, I trust that all is again as it ought to be, and as we wish. With regard to my writing, you accuse me without reason: for Pomponia has never acquainted me with any opportunity of sending a letter; neither has it happened to me to know of anybody that was going to Epirus, nor had I even heard that you were yet at Athens. As soon as I came to Rome after your departure, I despatched the business of Acutilius, which you had intrusted to me, but it turned out that there was no need of exertion; and being persuaded of the sufficiency of your own judgment, I chose that Peduceus, rather than I, should give you an opinion by letter. For after having several days heard what Acutilius had to say (with whose manner of prosing I presume you are acquainted), I should hardly have thought much of writing to you upon the subject of his complaints, when I had not scrupled (which was no pleasant task) to listen to them. But while you accuse me, remember that I have received but one letter from you; though you have had so much more leisure for writing, and so many more opportunities of sending your letters. When you tell me that if anybody<sup>d</sup> were offended with you, it was my business to appease him; mind what you say: I have not neglected that also. But he is strangely irritated. I have not, however, omitted anything that was to be said on your part. But how far it was to be urged, I thought it best to be determined by your wishes; which, if you will only let me know, you shall find that I have not chosen to be more forward than you would be yourself, nor shall I be more remiss than you may desire. Tadius has informed me respecting his affair, that you had written as if there was now no occasion to be uneasy, because the inheritance was secured by prescription*. I was surprised you should not have known, that in a legal guardianship, under which the girl is said to be placed, no prescription can be established. I am glad you are pleased with your purchase<sup>f</sup> in Epirus. I should wish, as you mention, that, as far as you can without inconvenience, you would attend to the commission I gave you<sup>g</sup>; and in such a manner as you may judge suitable to my Tusculan villa. For, after all my troubles and fatigues, it is there I find repose, where I am now daily expecting my brother. Terentia<sup>h</sup> is affected with severe pains in the joints; she has a great regard for you, and your sister, and mother, and wishes your best health, as does my darling Tullia<sup>i</sup>. Take care of yourself, and continue to love me, and believe me to love you as a brother.

LETTER II.

(Græv. vi.)

I WILL hereafter give you no occasion of charging me with neglect of writing. Do you only take care that, in your abundant leisure, you are even with me. Rabirius's house at Naples, which you had already measured and completed in your mind, has been purchased by M. Fonteius for 130,000 sesteratii (£1083)<sup>j</sup>. I wished you to be acquainted

* The term of undisputed possession, which conferred a prescriptive title among Roman citizens, was by the XII. Tables fixed at two years for landed property, and one year for personal property.

<sup>j</sup> In this and other parts of this translation I have retained the Latin terms of sesteratii and sestertia, because different interpreters might estimate them differently; at the same time, for the convenience of the English reader, I have subjoined what I suppose to be the amount in pounds sterling. The expression H.S. ((1)) XXX is generally agreed to mean 130,000, in which case the first characters (signifying 100,000) are to be understood of sesteratii, while the tens imply 30 sestertia, each containing 1000 sesteratii. And these different characters are usually so applied. Thus H.S. ((1)) ((1)) CCCC, and H.S. XXCD, which we find in the 3d and 4th letters of this book, are equally expressive of 20,400, the former being sesteratii; the decimal part of the latter, sestertia. The value of Roman money is deduced from the actual value of the denarius, which is to be met with in all collections, and is worth about eightpence English. Hence it follows that the sestertius (two asses and a half, or a quarter of the denarius) is equivalent to two-pence, and a thousand sesteratii to 8*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

In order to reduce the sesteratii to English pounds, it is only necessary to divide by 130. The characters expressive of their number are usually (1) 1000, ((1)) 10,000, (((1))) with this, in case it should any way affect your plans. My brother Quintus seems to be disposed towards Pomponia, as we could wish, and is now with her at his estate near Arpinum, where he has with him D. Turranius, a man of excellent acquirements. My father died the 24th of November<sup>k</sup>. This is the sum of what I had to say to you. If you should be able to meet with any ornaments of the gymnasiac kind<sup>l</sup>, which would suit that place which you know, I should be glad if you would secure them for me. I am so charmed with my Tusculan villa that I feel then only satisfied with myself when I get there. Let me know all that you do, and all that you intend to do.

LETTER III.

(Græv. vii.)

ALL is well with your mother<sup>m</sup>, for whom I entertain a great regard. I have engaged to pay L. Cincius<sup>n</sup> 20,400 sesteratii (£170) on the 13th of February. I should be glad if you would take care to let me have the things you have purchased and provided for me as soon as possible. And I wish 100,000, each additional pair of marks increasing the number tenfold.

The same letters H.S. likewise are used to denote sestertia, to which the figures X, &c. being added, seem to signify not only "decem," &c., but more commonly "decia," &c. the adverb being 100 times the value of the corresponding adjective.

The following table exhibits at one view the denominations of the sestertia, and the corresponding value in English money.

One thousand sesteratii	8 5 8
H.S. X (10) Dena sestertia	416 13 4
H.S. L (50) Quinquaginta sestertia	833 6 8
H.S. C (100) Centum sestertia	4,168 13 4
H.S. D (500) Quingules sestertium
DC, &c. Sexies (600), Septies (700), Octies (800), Novies (900).
H.S. X (1000) Decies sestertium	8,333 6 8
XX, &c. Vicies (2000), Tricies (3000), Quadrages (4000).
H.S. L (5000) Quinquagies sestertium	41,666 13 4
LC, &c. Sexagies (6000), Septuagies (7000), Octogies (8000), Nonagies (9000).
H.S. C (10,000) Centies sestertium	83,333 6 8
H.S. D (50,000) Quingenties sestertium	416,666 13 4
H.S. (1) (100,000) Millies sestertium	833,333 6 8

<sup>k</sup> This, which appears abrupt or unfeeling, loses that character when we consider that it must probably have been said either in reply to some inquiry of Atticus, or at specifying the date of an event previously known, or at least expected.

<sup>l</sup> Γυμνασιωδῆ, that is, such statues and other marbles as were erected in the gymnasia or public schools in Greece, and would be suitable to Cicero's favourite retreat near Tusculum, where he had built rooms and galleries in imitation of the schools and porticos of Athens, and which he likewise called by their Attic names of Academia and Gymnasium, and designed for the same purposes of philosophical inquiry.

you would consider, as you promised, how you can complete my library. All hope of the pleasure to which I look forward when I shall have come into retirement, is placed in you.

LETTER IV.

(Græv. viii.)

EVERYTHING is as we could wish at your house. Your mother and sister are held in the greatest esteem by me and my brother Quintus. I have had some conversation with Acutilius. He denies that anything had been written to him by his agent, and is surprised that any dispute should have arisen. The security which he demanded is no longer required from you. I have understood that Tadius is very thankful, and highly pleased with what you mention of having compromised the affair of his family. That friend of mine<sup>o</sup>, who is indeed a good man, and very friendly to me, is seriously angry with you. When I know how much you regard this, I may be able to judge what pains I should take in it. I have provided for L. Cincius 20,400 sesterii (£170) for the Megaric statues. The Mercuries of your Pentelic marble with bronze heads, about which you wrote to me, already delight me exceedingly; and I should be glad if you would send them, and the other statues, and whatever else you may judge suitable to the place, and to my studies, and to your taste, as many, and as soon as possible; especially what you think proper for my gymnasium and portico; for I am transported with such a fondness for these sort of things, that while I request you to assist me, I must expect others to lame me. If Lentulus's ship is not ready, let the kins be embarked in any other you please. My darling Tulliola<sup>a</sup> is anxious for your present, and dils upon me as a surety; but it is safer for me to wear off than to pay.

LETTER V.

(Græv. ix.)

I HEAR from you too seldom, though you can so much easier find people going to Rome than I can Athens; and you may be more sure of my being Rome than I can of your being at Athens. This letter is therefore the shorter, owing to my uncertainty; for, being doubtful where you might be, I am unwilling that this our familiar conversation should fall into strange hands.

I am anxiously expecting the Megaric statues Mercuries about which you wrote to me. Whatever of the same kind you may have, which I think fit for my Academy, do not hesitate to send it, and trust to my purse. These sort of things are my delight. I particularly want such as are most suitable to my gymnasium. Lentulus proposes the use of his ships. I request your diligence in these matters. Chilius asks you (and I at his desire) for an account of the national names of the Eumolpidæ<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Lucceius such diminutives expressive of endearment are not common in other languages, especially in Italian. Of this in authors, Catullus has made the most frequent use in, and often with singular beauty. The Eumolpidæ were a family of Thracian origin, conse-

LETTER VI.

(Græv. x.)

WHILE I was in my Tusculanum (this is in return for that of yours—"While I was in the Ceramicus"<sup>b</sup>); however, while I was there, a servant sent by your sister from Rome gave me the letter which had been brought from you, and said that he was to set out the same afternoon on his return. Hence it is that I determined to write something in answer to your letter, and am compelled by the shortness of the time to write but a few lines. In the first place, I will engage to appease, or even fully to reconcile our friend<sup>c</sup>; which although I did before in some measure, of my own accord, yet I will now set about it with more earnestness, and will urge him more strongly, since I perceive by your letter how great a stress you lay upon it. But I would have you understand that he is very deeply offended. Still, as I see no serious cause for it, I have great confidence that he will be moved by a sense of what is right, and by my authority.

I should be glad to have my statues and Hermeracles<sup>d</sup> embarked as soon as you have an opportunity, and anything else you may find proper for the place you know; especially what you think suitable to my palæstra and gymnasium. For I am sitting there while I write, so that the place itself reminds me. I commission you besides to procure some reliefs, which may be introduced into the ceiling of the ante-room; and two figured puteals<sup>e</sup>. Take care that you do not engage your library to anybody, however eager a lover of such things you may meet with, for I reserve all my gatherings for crated to the service of the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens, τοῦ τὴν τελετὴν αὐτοῖς κατασθησάμενου Εὐμόλου βαρβάρου καὶ Θρακὸς ὄντος. [Lucian, Demonax, 34.] What may be the exact meaning conveyed by the general term κατερίδι, it is not easy to say. It may, however, be observed, contrary to the interpretation of some commentators, that considering the secrecy always observed in regard to these mysteries, and that Cicero was himself one of the initiated, it can hardly be supposed that he would concur in any request to Atticus to reveal them.

<sup>c</sup> Ceramicus was the name of a district in the suburbs of Athens, which among other buildings contained the Academy, whose maxims were adopted by Cicero. In this and the other letters I have adopted the Latin expressions Tusculanum, Pompeianum, &c., signifying his house near Tusculum and Pompeii.

<sup>e</sup> It is not obvious to conceive how the two figures of Mercury and Hercules, or Minerva, indicated by the terms Hermeracles and Hermathena, could be combined in one statue. May it have been a stone case surmounted with a head of Mercury, and containing an image of Hercules or Minerva? Such are described by Plato in his Συμπόσιον, where Alcibiades compares Socrates to "those figures of Silenus in the sculptors' shops which open in the middle, and exhibit images of the gods," τοῖς σειλήνοις τοῖς αἰνῶσις ἐν τοῖς ἐργολαφείοις καθημένοις—οἱ δὲ χαλεπὸν διαχθέντες φαίνονται ἐνδοθεν ἀγάλματα ἔχοντες θεῶν.—Ed. Ficini. p. 1202.

<sup>f</sup> Putealia sigillata. These are usually supposed to have been the tops of wells, resembling some marbles still found among the ruins of ancient Italy. But it does not seem very probable that wells should be made a subject of ornament, and the real design of these marbles is not clearly made out. Perhaps it should be written putealia, as it is in some editions, signifying "sculptured cases," to hold manuscripts or other library apparatus.

Respecting my brother, I trust that things are as I have always wished, and have studied to make them. There are many reasons to believe it, and not the least is, that your sister is pregnant.

As to what regards my comitia<sup>a</sup>, I both remember that I excused you, and have long since declared this to our common friends who are expecting you. I shall not only not summon you, but shall forbid you. For I know that it is of much greater importance to you, that you should do what is to be done at this time, than it is to me that you should be present at the comitia. Therefore I would have you make up your mind, as if it were on my business that you were sent into that country. And you will find me towards you, and hear of me, in case of any success, as if it were gained, not only in your presence, but by your means. Tulliola appoints you a day: she calls upon your surety<sup>b</sup>.

LETTER VII.

(Græv. xi.)

I ACTED first of my own accord, and have since been much excited by your two letters written to the same purpose. In addition to which, Sallustius<sup>c</sup> has been constantly exhorting me to do my utmost with Luccius towards restoring your ancient friendship. But after all I could do, I have not only not been able to recover that good-will which he used to bear you, but not even to elicit the cause of his altered disposition. Although he speaks of that arbitration of his, and the things which before you left us I understood had given him offence, yet there is something that has sunk deeper in his mind, which neither your letters nor my assurance can so easily erase, as you can remove it in person, not only by conversation, but by your own familiar countenance; if only you think it worth while, which you certainly will if you take my advice, and act consistently with your natural kindness. You must not be surprised, if I before signified to you by letter that I hoped to find him tractable, and now appear to distrust. But it is incredible how determined his mind seems to be, and fixed in this angry mood. But this will either be set right when you arrive, or will make him very uneasy, whichever is in fault.

As to what you say in your letter, that you suppose I am already elected, you must know that nothing at Rome is so vexatious as the iniquitous proceedings against the candidates; nor is it known when the comitia will take place. But you will hear all about this from Philadelphus. I should be glad if you would send as soon as possible what you have got for my academy. Not only the actual enjoyment, but the very thought of that place delights me wonderfully. Remember not to give up your books to anybody; but keep them, as you say, for me. I entertain the strongest affection for them, as I do now distrust for everything else; for it is not to be believed in how short a time how much worse you will find things than you left them.

<sup>b</sup> These law terms are evidently introduced by Cicero in playful reference to his daughter's expectation of a present, which Atticus had promised to send her. Some would read, "she does not call upon your surety." The difference is of little moment. See letter 4 of this book.

LETTER VIII.

(Græv. iii.)

Know that your grandmother is dead from what of you<sup>a</sup>, and from fear lest the states<sup>b</sup> of Latium should not be steady in their duty, and should fail to bring the victims to Mount Albanus. I imagine L. Saufeius<sup>c</sup> will send to console you upon this event. We are expecting you here in January, either from common report, or from what you may have written to others; for to me you have written nothing about it. The statues which you have procured for me are landed at Caieta. I have not seen them; for it has not been in my power to leave Rome. I have sent a person to pay the freight. I am much obliged to you for having managed this so well, and so reasonably.

As to what you have repeatedly said about appeasing our friend, I have done and tried everything; but his mind is wonderfully estranged on account of certain suspicions, which, though I imagine you have heard, yet, when you arrive, you shall know from me. Sallustius, who is here, I have not been able to restore to the place he held in his affection. I mention this to you, because he used to accuse me on your account; but he has found by his own case that he is very inexorable, and that my attention to you has not been deficient. I have engaged my dear Tullia in marriage to C. Piso, son of Lucius Frugi.

LETTER IX.

(Græv. iv.)

You raise in us perpetual expectations of your arrival. Lately, when I supposed you to be coming, we were suddenly put off till July. Now, however, I imagine, as far as you can do it with convenience, you will really come at the time you mention. You will thus be at my brother Quintus's comitia<sup>b</sup>; we shall meet again after a long interval; and you will be able to conclude the business of Acutilius<sup>c</sup>. For this purpose Peduccus

<sup>b</sup> It must be supposed that this relates to some sacrifices and apprehensions which this old lady had expressed, and which may probably have been a subject of jest between the two friends. The ceremonies alluded to are those of the Latin festival, which used to be celebrated every year in memory of the union of the different neighbouring states of Latium. By the word Latinae I understand gentes, or civitates, not mulieres; for it does not appear that women had any part to perform there.

has also requested me to write to you ; for we are of opinion that it is desirable you should at length bring this affair to a conclusion. My intercession is, and has long been, prepared.

I have concluded the business of C. Macer with great and distinguished applause. And while I have done him every justice, have yet derived much greater advantage from the approbation of the people, upon his condemnation, than I could have done from any return on his part, had he been acquitted.

As to what you write to me about the Hermathena, it is exceedingly grateful to me, and an ornament proper for my academy ; Mercury being the common emblem of all schools, and Minerva the particular one of that school. I should be glad therefore, as you say, to have you contribute as many other things as possible to the embellishment of that place. The statues you before sent me I have not yet seen<sup>d</sup> ; they are at Formianum, where I am now intending to go. I shall transport all those things to Tusculanum. Should I ever begin to overflow, I will decorate Caleta<sup>e</sup>. Keep your books, and do not despair of my being able to make them mine ; which if I accomplish, I shall exceed Crassus in riches, and look down with contempt upon the houses and lands of all the world.

LETTER X.

(Grav. i.)

Of my canvas, in which I know you take a lively interest, this is the state, as far as can yet be foreseen. P. Galba alone is beginning to solicit votes ; he is refused without ceremony or disguise. People think that this premature canvassing is not unfavourable to my cause, for he very generally meets with denials under pretence of persons being under obligation to me. So I hope I may derive some advantage from it, as by this means the opinion spreads of my having many supporters. I had intended to begin canvassing in the Campus Martius, at the comitia for electing tribunes, the 7th of July, at the very time when I understood om Cincius that your servant was to set out with this letter. My competitors, which seem to be certain, are Galba, and Antonius, and Q. Cornificius. I imagine you will either smile or grieve at this. To enrage you quite, there are some who even think of Cæsonius. I do not apprehend quilius will offer ; for he denies it, and has sworn at he is ill, and has objected his judicial supremacy. Catiline will be a certain competitor, if it determined that the sun does not shine at mid-day<sup>f</sup>. I imagine you do not expect me to take notice of Aufidius and Palicanus.

Of those who are in nomination for this next

It may be thought singular that Cicero, who had exercised such a strong passion for these marbles, should have found time to visit them ; but it is probably to be accounted for by his being at this time one of the prætor's duties obliged him to reside in the city.

Caleta is probably the same as Formianum, under a rent name : Caleta being a sea-port, and Formie the name of a town at a short distance from it inland.

That is, if it be determined to shut the eyes against notorious proceedings, which are as clear as the meridian.

year, Cæsar<sup>g</sup> is thought secure. The contest is supposed to lie between Thermus and Silanus, who are so poor in friends and in reputation, that it seems to me not impossible to bring in Curius ; but this opinion is peculiar to myself. It appears most conducive to my cause that Thermus should be returned with Cæsar ; for of those who are not the present candidates, there is nobody who seems likely to be a more powerful opponent, if he should withdraw into my year ; because he has the charge of the Flaminian road, which will easily be completed by that time. I should therefore gladly see him now Cæsar's colleague<sup>h</sup>.

Such is the opinion hitherto formed of the candidates. I shall take care to use the greatest diligence in executing every part of a candidate's duty ; and possibly, since the Cisalpine Gaul<sup>i</sup> has considerable weight in voting, when the forum at Rome is a little cooled from its judicial causes, I may run down in September, as a lieutenant to Piso<sup>j</sup>, so as to be back in January. When I shall clearly have discovered the disposition of the nobles, I will write to you. The rest I hope will go smoothly, with only the present city competitors. Take care to engage for me, since you are nearer to them, that troop of our friend Pompeius. Tell him I shall not be angry with him, if he does not come to my election. So much for this business.

But there is one subject on which I am very anxious to have your forgiveness. Your uncle Cæcilius, having been defrauded of a considerable sum of money by P. Varius, commenced an action against his brother Caninius Satrius for the property, which he said he had received from Varius by a fraudulent transfer. Other creditors were parties in the same action ; amongst whom was Lucullus, and P. Scipio, and L. Pontius, who they supposed would be appointed administrators, if the goods were sold. But it is absurd now to speak of an administrator. Cæcilius requested me to support him against Satrius. Now, there is scarcely a day that this Satrius does not come to my house. His first attention is to L. Domitius ; his next to me. He was of great service to me, and my brother Quintus, in our canvasses. I am very truly embarrassed, both on account of my intimacy with Satrius, and with Domitius, on whom, above all, my present success depends. I explained this to Cæcilius, and at the same time assured him, that if the dispute lay between them two alone, I would comply with his wishes ; but that now, in the general cause of all the creditors (people especially of the first authority, who, without Cæcilius's appointing anybody in his own name, could easily maintain their common cause) it was reasonable that he should consider the obligations and circumstances under which I lie. He seemed to receive this more harshly than I could wish, or than gentlemen use to do ; and afterwards he entirely brake off the intercourse between us, which had been a few days

<sup>h</sup> There is evidently some error in the text. I have given what appears to be the sense intended.

<sup>i</sup> Cisalpine Gaul was the ancient name for Lombardy : those who had passed through the first magistracies in the towns south of the Po, had a right of voting in the assemblies of the Roman people.

established. I have to beg that you will not take this ill of me, but will consider that I was prevented by common humanity from coming forward in the time of his distress against the high reputation of a friend who had exerted all his efforts and kind offices to serve me. Or if you are disposed to pass a harsh sentence upon me, you will suppose it was my ambitious views that stood in the way. But I think, even if it were so, that I should still deserve to be forgiven, considering that this occasion is no trifling one. For you see in what progress we are, and how important it is not only to retain, but to acquire the good-will of all people. I hope I have proved my case; I certainly wish it.

Your Hermathena delights me exceedingly; and it is so well placed, that the whole gymnasium derives a lustre from it, as from the sun<sup>k</sup>. You have my best affections.

LETTER XI.

(Græc. ii.)

In the consulate<sup>l</sup> of L. Julius Cæsar and C. Marcus Figulus, know that I have a son born, and that Terentia is going on well. No letter from you after so long a time? I before sent you a particular account of the state of my interests. I am at present thinking to undertake the defence of my competitor Catilina<sup>m</sup>. The judges are such as we could wish, and with the full consent of the accuser<sup>n</sup>. I hope, if he should be acquitted, to have him the more friendly in the business of my canvass. Should it fall out otherwise, we must bear it with patience. I have great need of your speedy arrival: for it is the general opinion that some noble<sup>o</sup> persons of your acquaintance will oppose my success. I foresee that you can be of the greatest use in conciliating their good will towards me; therefore do not fail to be at Rome in January, as you have appointed.

[Between the eleventh and twelfth letters of this collection must have intervened a period of more than three years, during which the correspondence is interrupted, owing, as it should seem, to Atticus's having come to Rome to assist Cicero in his election, and remaining there with him through the period of his consulship.]

<sup>m</sup> This is the same Catilina whose conspiracy Cicero afterwards defeated with so much applause in his consulate. Catilina was at this time charged with peculation in Africa. There is no doubt but Cicero's object was to promote his own election by the co-operation of Catilina's connexions, which were numerous, and among the first families of Rome. He however changed his mind, and did not defend him.

<sup>o</sup> None of Cicero's ancestors having been ennobled by holding the higher offices of the state, it is on this account that he was sometimes taunted with the appellation of a "new man." The same cause excited the jealousy of the nobles towards him, whom they looked upon as an ambitious and popular upstart.

LETTER XII.

THAT Trojan woman<sup>p</sup> is a slow business; nor did Cornelius afterwards return to Terentia<sup>q</sup>. I think we must have recourse to Considius, Anus, Selicius<sup>r</sup>, for the nearest relations cannot extract money from Cæcilius at less than twelve per cent.<sup>s</sup> But, to return to my first subject: I have known nothing more shameless, more cunning, more sluggish, than her<sup>t</sup>. "I send one of my freedmen" — "I have given directions to Titus" — mere pretexts and delays! But it may be that fortune orders things better than we ourselves; for Pompeius's forerunners tell me that he will openly propose that Antonius should be superseded; and at the same time the prætor will bring it before the people. It is an affair of that kind, that I cannot honourably defend the man with the good esteem either of the respectable part of society, or of the populace, nor do I choose to do it, which is most of all; for a circumstance has occurred, which I send to you entire, that you may see the nature of it. I have a freed-man, a good-for-nothing fellow, Hilarus I mean, the accomptant, and a client of yours. Of him Valerius the interpreter<sup>u</sup> relates the following account, and Chilius writes me word that he has heard the same; that this fellow is with Antonius, and that Antonius, in making his exactions, gives out that a part is demanded for me, and that this freed-man is sent by me to look after the common plunder. I am not a little disturbed, though I can hardly believe it; but there has certainly been some conversation to this effect. Pray investigate the whole: inquire, learn, and, if you can by any means, remove the scandal from those parts<sup>v</sup>. Valerius mentioned Cæsar

<sup>p</sup> Teucris illa. The person thus designated is universally agreed to be that C. Antonius who had been colleague with Cicero in his consulate, and whom Cicero had gained by voluntarily resigning to him the valuable province of Macedonia, to which Cicero would otherwise have been appointed upon going out of office. Various conjectures have been formed about the term here applied to him, which, as it probably relates to some private understanding between Cicero and Atticus, must ever remain obscure. It seems to be a contemptuous expression, used in imitation of the Greek feminines, which were sometimes applied to men, and which Pope has thus rendered in his Homer—

"O, women of Achæa, men no more."

So afterwards [letter 14 of this book] we find Cicero using the term "filioia Curionis," meaning "the effeminate son of Curio."

<sup>q</sup> Terentia, we know, was Cicero's wife. Cornelius was quaestor to Antonius, and by what follows seems to have been employed by him to deceive Terentia with false promises of repaying some money perhaps advanced by her. Is this the reason of the term latum negotium?

<sup>s</sup> Centesima. The Latin indicates one per cent.; but it is to be remembered that the Romans calculated their interest not by the year, but by the month. The calends and ides, that is, the beginning and middle of each month, being the usual times of payment.

cius as his authority for this report. I early beg you will see what all this is. It appears Pompeius is very friendly to me; his divorce actio<sup>a</sup> is much approved. I imagine you have that P. Clodius, the son of Appius, was tied in women's clothes at the house of Caius; while the religious ceremonies for the people were going on, and that he was saved, and cut out by the hands of a servant-girl; that an affair of great scandal, which I know you sorry for. I have nothing more to tell you. I truth I have been a good deal distressed, theus, my reader, a pleasing youth, is lately which has disturbed me more than the death ought to have done. I hope you will write to me: if you have nothing to say, say meas uppermost. The first of January, in the ship of M. Messala and M. Piso<sup>7</sup>.

LETTER XIII.

These letters might well write in return; but I have been the y from want of a trusty messenger; are there who can carry a letter of any out lightening it by a perusal<sup>b</sup>! or to Epirots. Since your departure some things have occurred deserving of notice, but not to be exposed to the risk of my letter's being either lost, or opened, or intercepted.

You must know then in the first place, that I was not the first called upon for my opinion<sup>a</sup>, and that the peace-maker of the Allobroges<sup>4</sup> was put before me, which was done amidst the murmurs of the senate, but without any reluctance on my part; for I am thus freed from all obligation towards a perverse man<sup>2</sup>; and at liberty to maintain my own dignity in the state in spite of his wishes. And this second place of delivering my sentiments, carries with it nearly the same authority as the first, while it leaves the judgment unfettered by any obligation towards the consul. The third is Catullus; the fourth (if you wish to know that too) Hortensius. But the consul himself is of a narrow and poor spirit, an ill-natured snarler of that sort which even without railery is laughed at; ridiculous rather from his features, than his wit<sup>b</sup>: concurring in nothing with the state; separated from all the principal people; from whom one can expect no good to the state, because he wishes it no good; and from whom one need fear no harm, because he dares not commit it. His colleague<sup>1</sup> is very attentive to me, and a follower and supporter of the best parties. There is besides some little disagreement between them: but I fear lest that which is diseased in the state may spread further; for I suppose you have heard that, while the sacred ceremonies for the people were performing at Cæsar's house, a man came there in female dress; and when the vestal virgins had renewed the sacrifice, mention was made of it in the senate by Q. Cornificius. He was the first, that you may not suspect any of us. Afterwards the affair was, by a decree of the senate, referred to the pontiffs, and it was determined by them to be sacrilege. The consuls then, by another decree of the senate, published an indictment, and Cæsar sent his wife a bill of divorce. In this cause Piso, induced by his friendship with P. Clodius, uses his divided into two provinces of Achæa and Macedonia, of which the former included the whole of Greece proper. It appears from Cicero's Familiar Letters, [letters 4, 5, &c.,] that Ser. Sulpicius, as governor of Achæa, had jurisdiction over the Peloponnesus, Attica, Bœotia, Thessaly, and Epirus: therefore Plinius calls it "Achæiam, illam veram et meram Græciam." And Pausanias says, καλοῦσι δὲ οὐχ' Ἑλλάδος, ἀλλ' Ἀχαιας ἡγεμόνα οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι, διότι ἐχειρόσαντο Ἑλληνας δι' Ἀχαιῶν, τότε τοῦ Ἑλληνικοῦ προεστῆκέντων. [Lib. vii.] And this extended sense is to be given to the word Ἀχαια, when it occurs in the New Testament, as in Acts xviii. 12; and again, ch. xix. 21; also, 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

<sup>e</sup> It seems to have been the custom for the consul, upon first entering into office, to call upon the consular senators for their opinion in what order he thought proper; which order was observed during the remainder of the year.

<sup>f</sup> By this expression is to be understood Caius Piso, who had presided over the province of Gallia Narbonensis, in which the Allobroges dwelt.

endeavours that this indictment, which he himself prefers, and prefers by order of the senate, and for the sake of religion, may be set aside. Messala is hitherto very strenuous for measures of severity. Good men are kept away by the entreaties of Clodius; ruffians are provided; and I myself, who had been a very Lycurgus at the beginning, am daily softened down. Cato is instant and urgent. In short, I am afraid lest these matters, neglected by the good, and supported by the wicked, may be the occasion of serious evils to the republic. But that friend of yours (you know who I mean<sup>1</sup>; about whom you wrote to me, that when he no longer dared to find fault, he began to commend) makes a show of great regard for me; salutes me, loves me, openly praises me; secretly, yet so that it is sufficiently manifest, he envies me: there is nothing kind in him, nothing candid, nothing disinterested in his politics, nothing illustrious, nothing brave, nothing liberal. But these things I will detail to you more particularly some other time; for they are not yet sufficiently known to me; nor do I care to intrust to this fellow, of whom I know nothing, a letter about things of such importance. The prætors have not yet had their provinces allotted them; the business is in the same state in which you left it<sup>2</sup>. The geographical position of Misenum and Puteoli, which you require, shall have a place in my speech. I had observed that the date of the third of December was wrong. The parts of my speeches which you commend, I assure you pleased me very much; though I did not before venture to say so. But now that they have your approbation, they appear to me more truly Attic<sup>3</sup>. I have added something to the speech against Metellus<sup>4</sup>. The book shall be sent to you, since your kind regard for me has given you a taste for oratorical writings. What news shall I send you? what? The consul Messala has bought Autronius's house for 437 sester tia<sup>5</sup> (£33,600.) What is that to me? you will say; only that in comparison with this purchase, I must be judged to have laid out my money prudently; and people have begun to understand that, in buying, it is very allowable to use the assistance of one's friends, in order to attain some respectability<sup>6</sup>. That Trojan woman is a slow business; but, however, there is some hope. Do you bring these matters to a conclusion. You may expect to hear from me again with more freedom. January 7, in the consulship of M. Messala and M. Fio.

LETTER XIV.

I AM afraid you will be tired of hearing how much I am engaged; but in truth I have been so busy, that I have scarcely had time for this short letter, and that has been snatched from important occupations. I mentioned in a former letter<sup>7</sup> Pompeius's first harangue; that it was not acceptable to the poor, that it appeared spiritless to the wicked, unsatisfactory to the rich, undignified to the good; in short, it was a cold performance. Afterwards, at the instigation of the consul Fio, that inconsiderate tribune Fufius brought Pompeius forth to the assembly of the people. The business was conducted in the Flaminian Circus, and the same day, in that very place, was a fair held. He inquired of him whether he approved of the judges being chosen by the prætor in the affair of Clodius's sacrilege; which judges the same prætor was to use as his council; as it had already been appointed by the senate. Upon which Pompeius spoke quite aristocratically; replying, that the authority of the senate on all occasions had now, and always, the greatest weight with him; and this he professed at great length. Afterwards the consul Messala inquired of Pompeius in the senate, what he thought of the offence to religion, what of the indictment announced. He spoke in such a manner in the senate as to commend generally all the acts of that body; and said to me, as he sat by me, that he thought his answer contained a sufficient reply to the questions proposed to him. Crassus, perceiving that it gained him applause to have it supposed that he was pleased with my consulate, rose up, and spoke of my consulate in the handsomest manner, saying, that he owed it to me that he was a senator, that he enjoyed his freedom and his life; that as often as he saw his wife, his home, his country, so often he saw blessings derived from me: in short, all those topics of fire and sword, which I used variously to represent in my speeches (you, who are my Aristarchus and critic, know those repositories of ornaments), he interwove with great effect. I was sitting next Pompeius, and observed him to be moved; whether it was that Crassus should have gained the applause which he had missed, or that my deeds should be so esteemed as to obtain the ready concurrence of the senate to the praises bestowed upon them, especially by one who owed it to me the less, because, in all my letters in commendation of Pompeius, he had been lightly spoken of. This day much attached me to Crassus: and whatever was given covertly, I willingly acknowledged from him openly. But as for myself, ye gods! how I exulted before my new bearer, Pompeius! If periods and inflections, if deductions and arguments, ever availed me, it was then; in short, there were general cheers: for the subject was, of the dignity

<sup>2</sup> Q. Cicero had been one of the prætors, which made this circumstance of some interest both to Cicero and to Atticus, the one his brother, the other his brother-in-law.

<sup>4</sup> The tribune Metellus had been active in opposing Cicero, charging him with having put citizens to death without a trial.

<sup>5</sup> If the text be correct, the amount in English money would be about 3542l. But there is great reason to suspect some error, such as may easily be made in transcribing figures; for Cicero mentions this purchase as a justification of his own conduct in borrowing money for a house in Rome, for which it appears by his Familiar Letters that he gave 3500 sester tia, or near 30,000l. [Ep. Fam. v. 6.] It seems probable, therefore, that instead of CCCXXXVII it ought to be written either (1) (1) XXXVII, which would be equivalent to 33,644l., or XXXVII (trices septies, 3700) equivalent to 30,833l.

<sup>8</sup> Pompeius having applied for the honour of a triumph, was obliged to conform to the custom of residing beyond the walls of Rome till that was over. It was, therefore, in compliment to him that the meetings of the people and of the senate were at this time held out of the city.

he senate, the unanimity of the knights, the ent of all Italy, the expiring remains of the piracy, of plenty and peace. You know my rs on such materials: they were so exerted, I am the more brief, because I imagine that must have been heard even as far as you.

this is the state of affairs at Rome. The is our Areopagus*: nothing can be more nothing more upright, nothing more strenuous when the day was come for bringing forth the impeachment, according to the decree of late, there were collected youths scarcely 1, the whole herd of Catiline, with the e son of Curio at their head, demanding of ple to set aside the impeachment. Even e consul, who had proposed it, was now himself against it. The Clodian mob had cession of the passages; and voting papers nished so, that none might be given significant. Here then Cato rushes to the rostrum utters a most severe reproach on the iso, if that can be called reproach, which dignity, full of authority, full of wholesome. now, to return to private matters, the Trojan woman has made good her promises. Do you accomplish the commissions which you have undertaken. My brother Quintus, who has purchased the remaining three quarters of the Argiletan building for 725 æstertia (5000*l.*), is desirous of selling his Tusculanum, in order to buy, if he can, Pacilius's house. I want you to be reconciled to Lucceius. I see him very desirous of it, and will lend my assistance. Let me know exactly what you are doing, where you are, and how things are going on. The 13th of February.

LETTER XV.

You have heard that the province of Asia<sup>a</sup> has fallen to my dear brother Quintus; for I doubt not but common report has brought you this intelligence swifter than any friend's letter. Now, as you know I have always been very greedy of praise; and am, and am esteemed, beyond all men attached to the Greeks; and have incurred much obloquy and enmity in the cause of the republic; do you therefore "call to mind all your prowess," and by your management contrive that I may be praised and loved by everybody. Upon this subject I will write more to you in the letter I shall send by Quintus himself. I should be glad if you would let me know what you have done about my commissions: and what, also, about your own business; for since your departure from Brundisium, no letters from you have been delivered to me. I want much to know how you do. March 15.

LETTER XVI.

You ask me what happened at the trial, that the issue should have been so contrary to all expectation; and at the same time you desire to know how it happened that I battled less than usual. I shall answer you the last first, like Homer<sup>b</sup>. For, as long as the authority of the senate required my support, I fought with such eagerness and vehemence, as to excite shouts and acclamations greatly to my honour. And if ever you thought me strenuous in the public cause, you would certainly have admired me upon that occasion; for when he had recourse to his declamations, and in them used my name invidiously, ye immortal gods! what fighting, what execution did I exhibit! What attacks did I make upon Piso, upon Curio—upon the whole crew! How did I assail the levity of the

<sup>b</sup> The original is taken from a verse of Homer. Cicero means to request that Atticus, who was invited to be lieutenant to Quintus, would exert himself to render the Greeks of Asia Minor favourable to him; and that he should do so, he offers three reasons: 1st, that he was fond of praise from all men; 2dly, that he had himself always shown a partiality towards the Greeks; and 3dly, because he was apprehensive lest the enemies he had made by his vigorous conduct in his consularship might endeavor to injure his reputation abroad. Atticus, however, refused to accept the appointment of lieutenant.

old, the wantonness of the young! Often did I want you, so help me gods! not only as an adviser of my plans, but as a witness of my extraordinary exertions. But after Hortensius had devised that the tribune Fufius should bring in the law respecting the sacrilege (in which there was no other difference from the consular indictment, excepting in the condition of the judges; though in that was everything), and was earnest that it might be so done; having persuaded himself, and others, that no judges<sup>a</sup> could absolve him, I contracted my sails, knowing well the inefficiency of such judges, and I said nothing in my evidence but what was so well known and attested that I could not omit it. If, therefore, you ask me the reason of the acquittal (to revert now to your first question), it was the neediness and baseness of the judges; and that it should so happen was occasioned by Hortensius's proposal; who, fearing lest Fufius's intercession might put a stop to the progress of the law, as decreed by the senate, did not perceive that it was better to have him left in disgrace and ignominy, than intrusted to an unsound court of judgment. But prompted by his hatred, he hastened to bring the matter to a trial, saying, that even before a leaden sword he must needs fall. But if you ask what were the circumstances of this judgment which had so incredible an issue, I answer, such that the counsel of Hortensius, which now from the event is censured by others, was by me censured from the very beginning. For as the rejection of a judge is made with the greatest applause, when the prosecutor, like an upright censor, rejects persons of bad character, and the defendant, like a kind master of gladiators, selects the most temperate; here, on the contrary, as soon as the judges sat down together, all honest men began to have sad misgivings<sup>b</sup>; for a baser set never met together in a common gaming-house: senators of stained reputation, ruined knights, and tribunes, not debtors, so much as receivers<sup>c</sup>. There were, however, a few honest men among them, whom he could not remove by rejection, who sat downcast and mournful among people most unlike to themselves, and seemed afraid of being infected by the contagion of their infamy. Here, as each charge was submitted to this council, in the first inquiries, there appeared a surprising severity, without any difference of opinion: the defendant had obtained nothing; more was even granted to the prosecutor than he asked; Hortensius, in short, was exulting that he should have managed so well. There was nobody who did not think him guilty, and a thousand times condemned. Upon my being brought forwards as a witness, I imagine you will have heard from the acclamation even of Clodius's advocates, what rising of the judges took place, how they surrounded me, how openly they exposed their throats to P. Clodius for my security: which I consider a much greater honour than that which was shown to Xenocrates, whom your countrymen prevented from swearing when he gave his testimony: or that of our judges, who refused to look at the accounts of Metellus Numidicus, when they were brought round as usual. What was done to me, I say, is much greater. So that by the voice of his judges, when I was so defended by them as the safeguard of the country, the culprit was confounded, and all his supporters shrunk at once; and the next day the same concourse came about me as had conducted me home on resigning the consulship. The noble Areopagites<sup>d</sup> cried out that they would not come forward unless a guard was appointed. It was submitted to the council: one voice alone was against having a guard. The affair was brought before the senate: it was decreed with great dignity and liberality; the judges were commended; the business was intrusted to the magistrates: nobody thought the man would make any reply. Say now, ye Muses, how the fire was first kindled<sup>e</sup>. You know Baldhead<sup>f</sup>, him of the Nanneian estates, that panegyrist of mine, whose speech I mentioned to you so full of my praise. In two days he accomplished the whole business by means of a single slave, and him taken from the school of the gladiators. He sent for the judges to come to him; he promised, he entreated, he bribed. Nay, more, O ye gods! such a prodigate business! even the enjoyment of certain women, and the introduction of young men of family, were made to enhance the price offered to some of the judges. Thus, in the general absence of all honest men, while the forum was filled with slaves, there were still twenty-five judges so firm, that, in face of the greatest danger they chose rather to perish than to ruin everything: there were thirty-one who were more moved by fame than by fame: one of whom Catulus meeting said to him, "What made you ask us for a guard? were you afraid of having your money taken away?" You have here, as shortly as I<sup>g</sup> could give it you, the nature of the trial, and the reason of the acquittal.

You ask further what is the present state of public affairs, and how I am affected. Know, then, that the constitution of the republic; which you thought my counsels, I thought divine Providence<sup>h</sup>, had confirmed; which seemed to be fixed and consolidated by the union of all good men, and the authority of my consulship; unless some god have compassion upon us, has slipped from our hands by this single judgment: if it can be called a judgment, that thirty of the lowest and most profligate of the Roman people, by the effect of bribery, should extinguish all right and justice: and, what not only all men, but all animals, know to have been done, that Talna, and Plantes, and Spongia, and such scoundrels, should determine not to have been done. But yet, that I may offer you some consolation on the part of the republic, wickedness does not exult in its<sup>i</sup> victory with that alacrity which some miscreants had hoped, after <sup>d</sup> I doubt not these expressions have a reference to the doctrines of Epicurus against a superintending Providence; Atticus, as is well known, being of that sect.

wound which has been inflicted on the state; they fully thought, when religion and modesty, the faith of judgments, and the authority of senate had fallen, that then wickedness and dishonesty, being openly victorious, would exact any honest man vengeance for the pain which the villain had suffered by the severity of my whip. And I, that same person (for I need not the reproach of vain-gloriousness in speaking myself to you, especially in a letter which nobody else to read), myself, I say, have the drooping spirits of good men, encouraging every one: and by persecuting using these corrupt judges, I have snatched you from all the supporters and favourers of iniquity. I have never suffered the consul to be at peace in anything: I have taken away from you the province of Syria, already promised; I have recalled the senate to its former state and have roused it from its despondence. I have crushed when he was present in the senate by a continued speech full of dignity, moderation, of which you may taste a few; for the rest can neither have their elegance, from want of that spirit of which our Greeks call ἀγῶνα. For when the senate on the 15th of May, being in my opinion, I entered at length in the normal state of the republic, and seemed to me when I brought in that head of my "that the conscript fathers", on the single wound, should not be dejected, faint; that it was a wound of such a nature that it neither to be dissembled nor to be healed should be thought either cowards by the people at it, or stupid by not being sensible that the consul had been twice acquitted; twice that he now was the third let loose upon the judgment of his judges. You are mistaken, judges have reserved you not for the state prison, and have wished not to send you to the state, but to deprive you of the consul. Therefore, conscript fathers, raise up to maintain your dignity: that concord of the senate yet remains in the republic: they are but their courage is unabated: no new created; but what was there brought to light: in the trial of the consul several have been found like what am I doing? I have almost said each in my letter. I return to our little pretty boy gets up, and objects to have been at Baiae. "It is not true: is it? Is it the same," added I, to say I had been in concealment," says he, "has a fellow of with hot baths?" I think it more likely that Crassus: but the particular circum-

"Do you venture to pronounce the word king," said I, "when he whose name was king did not so much as mention you in his will?" (For he had devoured the inheritance of Rex in his expectation.) "You have been buying a fine house," says he. "One would think," said I, "you were accusing me of buying the judges." "They would not trust you," says he, "even on your oath." "Nay, but," said I, "five-and-twenty did trust me: the other one-and-thirty did not trust you, for they took care to receive their money beforehand." Overwhelmed by continued shouts, he sunk down, and held his tongue. My situation is this. Among the good, I am just as you left me; among the filth and dregs of the city, much better now than you left me; for it is no prejudice to me that my evidence should seem to have had no effect. Their ill-disposition has been let blood without any pain to me; and the more so, because all those supporters of that iniquity acknowledge that a very clear case was bought off from the judges. In addition to this, that wretched and hungry rabble, who hang about the popular assemblies like a leech, eager for money, imagine that I am much esteemed by this Magnus<sup>3</sup>. And indeed we are united together by a frequent and pleasant intercourse to such a degree, that those our revellers in conspiracy<sup>4</sup>, half-bearded youths, in their conversations call him Cnæus<sup>5</sup> Cicero. Therefore, in the games and shows I carry off wonderful marks of favour, without any shepherd's pipe to intermingle its hissing<sup>6</sup>. The public attention is just now directed to the comitia for the election of consuls. Our Magnus, against the wish of everybody, thrusts forwards the son of Aulus<sup>7</sup>; and in conducting this business, he endeavours to gain his cause, neither by authority nor by favour, but by those means with which king Philippus said he was able to take any castle into which an ass laden with gold could get up. It is said that a certain consul has undertaken the affair, like Doterio<sup>8</sup> the player; and that he has people in his house to distribute money, which I do not believe. But there have lately been made two hateful decrees of the senate, which are supposed to be directed against the consul, on the requisition of Cato and Domitius: one, that it might be lawful to search the houses even of magistrates on informations of bribery; the other, that anybody who had distributors of money in his house, should be considered as an enemy to the state. Lurco, one of the stances and private histories of those remote times are not sufficiently preserved to enable any person to speak with confidence about it.

tribunes of the people, who entered upon his office at the time of the Ælian law, has been set free from the operation both of the Ælian and Fufian law, that he might introduce another on canvassing at elections; which, lame as he is<sup>a</sup>, he has promulgated under prosperous omens. So the comitia are put off to the 27th of July. The novelty in the law is this: that anybody who shall have promised money in his tribe, if he have not given it, shall be exempt from penalty; but if he have given it, he shall have to pay to each tribe three thousand sestertii<sup>b</sup> (25*l.*) annually, as long as he lives. I observed that P. Clodius had already kept this law, inasmuch as he was accustomed to promise, and not to pay. But mark you; do you perceive how my consulate, which Curio before called a deification, will, if this man be elected, become a mere puppet-show<sup>c</sup>? Therefore I believe we must content ourselves with our philosophy, as you do; and disregard these affairs of consulships as unworthy of notice.

As to what you tell me, that you have determined not to go into Asia, I should rather have wished that you did go; and cannot but fear that some unpleasant consequence may arise from that circumstance<sup>d</sup>. At the same time I cannot blame your determination, especially after having declined to accept a province myself. I shall be content with your epigrams, which you have placed in the Amaltheum; especially since Chilius has left me, and Archias has written nothing<sup>e</sup>. But having already composed a Greek poem in honour of the Luculli, I am afraid he will now turn his attention to the story of the Cæcili. I returned thanks to Antonius in your name, and delivered the letter to Manlius. I have hitherto written to you the less frequently, because I had no proper person to whom I could intrust my letters; nor did I sufficiently know what I should intrust to them. Farewell. I have now made you amends. If Cincius<sup>f</sup> refers to me any business of yours, I will readily undertake it; but he is just now more occupied in affairs of his own, in which I shall not be backward in assisting him. If you are likely to be stationary, you may expect often to hear from me; but do you also write frequently. I wish you would describe to me your Amaltheum, how it is situated, how it is fitted up; and that you would send me any poems, and stories you possess on the subject of Amalthea<sup>g</sup>. I should like to make one at Arpinum. I will send you something of my writing; at present there is nothing finished.

<sup>c</sup> The Latin Jabam mimum, if it be correct, is not now intelligible. I have given what I conceive to be the general signification.

<sup>g</sup> Amalthea is properly the fabulous name of the fabulous goat which was said to have nourished the infant Jupiter: it is, therefore, rightly expressed in this place. But Atticus's library was denominated Amaltheum. See letter 13 of this book, note c.

LETTER XVII.

I PERCEIVE from your letter, and from the copies of my brother Quintus's which you sent with it, a great alteration in his disposition and sentiments towards you; which affects me with all that concern which my extreme love for you both might be expected to produce; and I wonder what can have happened, that should occasion to my brother Quintus either such deep offence, or such changeableness of mind. I had already observed, what I saw that you also suspected at the time of your departure, that some unfavourable impression had arisen, and that he was hurt in mind, and harboured certain unfriendly suspicions; which, though I before often wished to heal, and especially after the allotment of his province; yet I was not aware that the offence he had conceived was so great as your letter declares; nor were my endeavours attended with the success that I hoped. But yet I consoled myself with the consideration, that I did not doubt but he would see you either at Dyrachium, or somewhere in those parts; and whenever that happened, I trusted, and persuaded myself, that everything would be amicably settled between you, not only by discourse and explanation, but by the very sight and meeting of each other. For what kindness there is in my brother Quintus, what cheerfulness, how tender a disposition both to conceive and to lay aside offence, it is needless for me to mention to you, who are well acquainted with it. But it has happened very unfortunately that you have not seen him anywhere. For what the malevolence of certain persons has suggested to him, has had more influence than either his duty or his relationship, or the former affection between you, which ought to have great weight: and it is easier to guess, than to declare, where the blame of this misfortune lies: for in defending my own relations, I am afraid of appearing harsh towards yours<sup>a</sup>. For this is my feeling upon the subject, that though no wound may have been inflicted by those of his own household, yet they certainly might have healed that which was already received. But the fault of this whole affair, which extends even something further than appears, I can better explain to you when we meet. Respecting the letter which he wrote to you from Thessalonica, and the language which you imagine he held with your friends at Rome, and upon his journey; what foundation there be for it I know not; but all my hope of removing this vexation rests in your kindness. For if you consider, that the minds of the best men are often irritable, and at the same time placable; and that this sensibility, as I may call it, and tenderness of nature, is generally a sign of goodness; and, what is the chief of all, that we ought mutually to bear with the ill humours, or faults, or offences of each other; these differences, as I hope, will easily be composed: and that you may do so, I earnestly entreat you: for it is of the greatest concern to me, who sincerely love you, that there should be no one of my connexions who either does not love you, or is not loved by you. That part of your letter was by no means necessary, in which you explain what opportunities of advantage either in the provinces or in the city you have foregone, as well at other as during my consulate: for your ingenuity and greatness of mind are well known to me. Nor have I ever thought there was any difference between us, except in the line of life we led; inasmuch as a certain ambition has led me to the pursuit of honours; whilst a different, yet irreproachable, scheme of life, has conduced you to an honourable retirement. In that use of sincerity, of diligence, of scrupulousness to duty, I set neither myself nor anyone before you; and in affection towards me, go beyond brotherly and domestic attachment, to attribute the first place to you. For I am, and thoroughly known, on various occasions your solicitude and your joy on my behalf. And often has your congratulation on my success been delightful to me, and your support in my most grateful. Nay, at this time, from my success, I feel a want not only of counsel, in my success, but of that intercourse of conversation which I enjoy with peculiar relish in your company.

What shall I say? In business of the world which it is not allowable for me to be engaged in, or in the fatigues of the forum? which I undertook for ambition's sake; now, I am enabled by favour to maintain my leisure in domestic concerns? in which, and particularly since the departure of my friends, I want you and our conversations. In my private labour, nor my rest, neither my idleness, nor forensic, nor domestic, nor public, nor private, can any other without your sweet and friendly conversation. From the mention of modesty has often restrained us both. Now been rendered necessary by that letter in which you study to clear and defend and your conduct. And amidst the distractions arising from his alienation and, this however has happened fortuitously, our resolution of declining all promulgations has been known, and occasionally by you to me and others of your party, your not being together may appear not of any disagreement and rupture, but of your inclination and judgment; those sentiments which have been easily admitted of expiation; and these which have been kept sacred, will conscientiously be maintained.

Engaged in a sickly, wretched, and painful. For I suppose you have heard me being nearly disunited from the party, took it very ill that a decree of mine had been promulgated, to induct into those who should have been judges. At the passing of this leniently absent; but when I found no order was much disturbed at it, I did not openly say so, I reproved the

we were divided into three orders, the plebeians. The business of the state as judges, or as farmers of the senate, as I thought, with great authority; and spoke forcibly and copiously in not the most honourable cause. Now for another favourite concern of the knights, scarcely to be borne, which, however, I have not only borne, but justified. The farmers of the revenue in Asia<sup>c</sup>, who had made their agreement with the censors, complained in the senate that they had been deceived by the hope of gain, and had made an improvident bargain, and petitioned that the letting might be set aside. I took the lead among their supporters; or rather I was the second; for it was Crassus who encouraged them to present this request. An odious business, disreputable petition, and a confession of imprudence. But there was the greatest reason to apprehend, that, if they gained no redress, they might be altogether alienated from the senate: This affair also was principally managed by me; and it was brought about that they obtained a very full and very friendly senate; and I said a good deal respecting the dignity and unanimity of the two orders, on the first of December and day following. The business is not yet finally settled, but the inclination of the senate has been clearly seen. Metellus, the consul elect, had alone spoken against it. That hero of ours, Cato, was going to speak, but owing to the shortness of the day it did not come to his turn. Thus maintaining my proposed line of conduct, I support, as well as I am able, that concord I had endeavoured to cement. But yet, since these measures are liable to fail, a certain safe way, as I hope, is fortifying to enable me to retain my authority. I cannot sufficiently explain this to you by letter, but I will give you a little hint. I am very familiar with Pompeius. I know what you will say. I will use caution, wherever caution can be used; and I will write more fully to you some other time about my intentions in conducting the business of the republic. Do you know that Lucceius purposes immediately to solicit the consulship? for there are said to be only two candidates. Cæsar, with whom he thinks he may unite through Arrius; and Bibulus, with whom he supposes he may be joined through C. Piso. Do you laugh? Believe me, this is no laughing matter. What else shall I tell you? What? There are many things: but at another time. If you would have us expect you, take care to let me know. Now I modestly beg, what I earnestly wish, that you will come as soon as you can. The fifth of December.

LETTER XVIII.

There is nothing of which I now so much feel the want, as of him with whom I can communicate every thing that concerns me; who loves me, who is prudent,—with whom I can converse without flattery, without dissimulation, without reserve. For my brother, who is all candour and kindness, is away; Metellus is no more to me than the seashore, or the air, a mere desert: but you, who have so often relieved my cares and anxieties by your conversation and counsel, who used to be my companion in public matters, my confidant in all private ones, the partaker of all my words and thoughts, where are you? I am so deserted by everybody that I have no other comfort but what is enjoyed with my wife and daughter, and my sweet little Cicero. For those ambitious and outward friendships make some show in public, but have no domestic fruit. So that whilst my house is full every morning,—whilst I go down to the Forum attended with troops of friends,—out of this crowd I can find nobody with whom I can either jest freely or open my bosom familiarly. Therefore I look for you, I want you, nay I call for you. For there are many things which trouble and distress me, which, could I pour them into your ears, I seem as if I could discharge in the conversation of a single walk. The stings and vexations of my domestic troubles I shall keep to myself, and not trust to this letter and to a strange messenger. And these (for I would not have you think too much of them) are not of great moment; but yet they hang upon me, and tease me, and have no friendly counsel or conversation to allay them. But in the republic, although there is a ready courage, yet the inclination to exert itself does again and again elude every remedy<sup>d</sup>. Should I but shortly collect together what has been done since your departure, you must needs exclaim, that the state of Rome can no longer subsist. For it was, I believe, after you left us, that the first entrance was made upon the cause of the Clodian story. Upon which occasion, conceiving that I had an opportunity of cutting down and restraining the licentiousness of the young, I exerted myself with vehemence, and poured forth all the powers of my mind and understanding,—influenced by no hostility towards anybody, but by the hope of correcting the republic and healing the state. Deeply is the republic injured by this corrupt and profligate judgment<sup>e</sup>. See now what has since taken place: a consul<sup>f</sup> has been imposed upon us whom nobody that is not as much a philosopher as ourselves can bear to look at without a sigh. How severe a wound is this! After a decree of the senate had passed respecting bribery at elections, respecting the conduct of judges, no law was carried through,—the senate was worried out,—the Roman knights alienated. So that year overturned two supports of the state which by me alone had been established; for the senate both threw away its authority and dissolved the union of the two orders. Now then another fine year has been entered upon! Its beginning has been such that the annual rites in honour of the tutelary goddess of Youth were omitted. For Memmius was engaged in initiating the wife of M. Lucullus in rites of his own<sup>g</sup>. Menelaus<sup>h</sup>, not brooking that, procured a divorce. But whereas that Idean shepherd<sup>i</sup> had only abused Menelaus,—this Paris of ours has treated both Menelaus and Agamemnon<sup>j</sup> with scorn. But there is one C. Herennius, a tribune, whom perhaps you have never heard of (though you may have heard of him, for he belongs to your tribe)<sup>k</sup>; and Sextus, his father, used to distribute among you the money of the candidates<sup>l</sup>. This man wants to translate P. Clodius to the condition of a plebeian<sup>m</sup>; and the same fellow proposes that the populace at large should vote on this affair of Clodius in the Campus Martius<sup>n</sup>. I have given him such a reception in the senate as I am accustomed to do to such scoundrels; but nothing can be more insensible than he is. Metellus is an excellent consul, and attached to me; but it lessens his authority that he has, as a matter of form, promulgated this proposal respecting Clodius. But this son of Aulus<sup>o</sup>, ye gods! how dull, how spiritless a soldier; how well he deserves to lead an ear every day, as he does, to hear himself abused by Palicanus. An Agrarian law has been promulgated by Flavius, a poor thing, almost the same as that of Plotius. In the mean time there is not a sound statesman, not a phantom of one, to be found. He who might be one, my intimate (for so he is, and I wish you to know it) Pompeius defends that painted robe of his<sup>p</sup> by keeping silence. Crassus utters not a word against the favour of the people. The others you are already acquainted with; who are so stupid that they hope to preserve their luxurious stew<sup>q</sup> when the republic is lost. The only person who administers any relief, rather by his firmness and integrity than by his counsel or prudence, is Cato, who now for the third month continues to harass the poor collectors<sup>r</sup>, who have been very friendly to him. So we are compelled to pass no decree about other matters till an answer is given to these collectors. I expect therefore that even the business of the embassies will be put off. You see now by what waves we are tossed: and if from what I have said you perceive that there is as much more unsaid, yet visit us once more; and although these parts to which I call you deserve to be shunned, nevertheless let the value you set upon our friendship be such, that you may be glad to enjoy it even with these vexations. For, that you may not be registered as an absentee, I will take care to have your return given out and proclaimed everywhere. To be registered just at the lustration<sup>s</sup> is like a very merchant.

satisfied the people and Pompeius (for that also I wished to do) by the purchase; which being carefully conducted, I hoped the lees of the city might be drawn off, and the waste lands of Italy peopled. But this whole affair has cooled again, having been interrupted by the war. Metellus is indeed a good consul, and is much attached to me: the other is such a mere cipher, that he does not even know what it is that he has bought<sup>a</sup>. These are the chief things of the republic; unless you may think it concerns the republic also, that one Herennius, a tribune of the people, of your tribe, a good-for-nothing and needy fellow, has several times instituted a motion for transferring P. Clodius to the rank of a plebeian: but many have interposed their prohibition. This, I think, is what has been doing in the republic. But for myself, after having once obtained the distinguished and immortal glory of that fifth of December<sup>b</sup>, not without much envy and ill will, I have never ceased to exert the same spirit in the republic, and to support that dignity which I had entered upon and attained. But when I had witnessed, first, in the acquittal of Clodius, the inconstancy and weakness of the judges; then saw how easily our knights collectors, though they continued friendly to me, were disunited from the senate; then again, that certain happy spirits (those luxurious possessors of fishponds, I mean, your friends) are undisguisedly envious of me; I considered that it was time to look out for some greater support and stronger securities. Therefore, first I brought Pompeius, who had too long observed a silence upon my transactions, into that disposition, that in the senate, not once, but repeatedly, and at considerable length, he attributed to me the safety of the empire and of the world: which did not so much concern me (for what I did is not so obscure as to stand in need of testimony, or so doubtful as to require commendation) as the republic; because there were certain ill-disposed people who expected that some contention might arise between me and Pompeius from a disagreement upon those matters. With him I have united myself in such intimacy, that each of us may hence be more fortified in his own line of conduct, and firmer in the republic, from this connexion. And that hostility of the licentious and delicate youth, which had been raised against me, has been so softened by my civility, that they all now pay me particular attention. In short, I do nothing harsh towards anybody,—nor, however, any thing popular and unbecoming; but my whole conduct is so regulated, that I maintain a constancy towards the republic; and in my private concerns, on account of the unsteadiness of the good, the unkindness of the malevolent, the hatred of the wicked, towards me, I adopt a certain caution and attention; and so bear my affections, whilst I am implicated in these new connexions, that the sly Sicilian Epicharmus often whispers in my ear that verse of his,—“Besober and distrustful; these are the sinews of the understanding:” and of my management and scheme of life you see, I think, as it were a model. Respecting your business you often write to me; but it is impossible to remedy it,—for the decree of the senate was carried by a great concurrence of members, without the authority of any of us consulars. For, as to your seeing that I was present when it was drawn up, you may understand from the decree itself that a different object was at that time brought forward; and this about the free people was added without any occasion,—and was so done by P. Servilius the son, who gave his opinion among the last. But at this time it cannot be altered: so that the meetings which were at first held on this subject have long since ceased to be kept up. If, however, by your gentle manners you have squeezed out of the Sicyonians any portion of money, I should be glad to be made acquainted with it. I have sent you the account of my consulate, written in Greek; in which, if there is anything that appears to an Attic gentleman not to be correct and good Greek, I will not say to you, what I think Lucullus said of his history, that he purposely introduced some barbarisms, that it might be known to be the work of a Roman. In mine if there be anything of that sort, it will be without my knowledge, and contrary to my inclination. If I complete that in Latin, I will send it to you. You may expect the third in verse<sup>w</sup>, that I may omit no mode of celebrating my own praises. Here take care that you do not quote upon me the Greek proverb, “Who will praise his father?”<sup>x</sup> For if there is anything better among men let it be praised, and let me be blamed for not rather bestowing my praises elsewhere; though what I write is, after all, not praise, but history. My brother Quintus studies to exculpate himself in his letters, and affirms that he never spoke anything against you to anybody: but this must be managed between us with great care and diligence when we meet. Do you only at length visit us again. This Cosinius, to whom I give my letter, seems to me an excellent man, free from levity, and affectionate towards you, and such as your letter represented him. The 15th of March.

LETTER XX.

UPON my return to Rome from my Pompeianum<sup>y</sup> on the 12th of May, our friend Cincius gave me your letter dated the 13th of February, to which I now reply. And first, I am very glad that you are so perfectly acquainted with my opinion respecting you<sup>z</sup>. In the next place, it gives me great satisfaction that you should have shown such moderation in those affairs in which I and my family were concerned, not without some appearance of harshness and unkindness<sup>a</sup>; which is a proof at once of no small affection, and of consummate judgment and prudence. On which <sup>x</sup> Some doubts have been entertained about the application of this proverb. In the beginning of Plutarch's life of Aratus it is quoted more at length; and from thence I should understand it here to signify, that as it was concluded that one who praised the deeds of his ancestors, had no merit of his own; so it might be inferred, that if Cicero was so vain of his consulship he had little else to boast of.

subject as you have written so graciously, so carefully, so fairly, and candidly, that I not only have nothing further to ask of you, but had no right to expect so much readiness and mildness from you, or from any man; I think it best to say nothing more about the business. When we meet, then, if any occasion occurs, we will confer together by word of mouth.

In what you say about the republic, you argue affectionately and wisely; and your opinion is not at variance with the line of conduct I have adopted. I ought neither to recede from the state of my dignity, nor to go without my host into the fortifications of another man; and he<sup>b</sup> of whom you speak, has nothing noble, nothing exalted, nothing that is not abject and popular. Yet the course I have taken is perhaps not without its advantage to myself in promoting the tranquillity of my own times; but it is still much more advantageous to the republic than to me, that the violence of the wicked against me should be repressed by my having confirmed the wavering opinion of one in the highest fortune, authority, and favour; and by having converted him from the hopes of bad men to the commendation of my actions. Had any meanness been necessary on my part, I should have thought no object an equivalent; but everything has been done in such a manner, that my dignity has sustained no diminution from compliance with him, while his is increased by his approbation of me. The rest is, and will continue to be, so managed, as not to permit that what I have done, may appear to have been done by accident. My good men, those whom you mention, and that Sparta<sup>c</sup>, which you say has fallen to my lot, I will not only never desert, but even if I am deserted by it, I will still continue in my former sentiments. I would wish you, however, to consider, that, since the death of Catulus, I maintain this course of honour without protectors, and without associates: for as Rhinton, I think, says, “some are as nothing, others care for nothing.” With regard to the envy which our epicures bear me, I will either write to you at another time or will reserve it till we meet. But nothing shall tear me from the senate; whether because it is right that we should be united, or that it is most suitable to my affairs, or that I am not sorry to be held in such esteem by them.

With regard to the Sicyonians, as I told you in a former letter, there is not much hope in the senate. For there is now nobody that offers any complaint. So that, if you wait for this, it is a long business. Try some other means if you can. For it has been concluded without animadversion from those whom it concerned; and the senators hastily ran to support the motion. The season is not yet come for superseding the decree; because there are not only none to complain, but many are very well pleased; partly through malice<sup>d</sup>, partly from an opinion of its justice. Your friend Metellus is an excellent consul. I have only to blame in him, that he is not very well pleased with the news of peace from Gaul. I suppose he is

Of my writings I have only my consulate in Greek. I delivered the L. Cosinius. But while you are pleased with Latin compositions, I imagine that, as you will bear towards this Greek one a pity. If anybody else writes upon this I will send it you. But, believe me, as they have read this of mine, they are checked. Now, to return to my own *L. Now, if you love me, if you know that you are beloved by me<sup>d</sup>, use your endeavours, through your friends, your clients, your guests, nay, your freed-men, and slaves, that not a scrap of them may be lost. For I want exceedingly both the Greek books, which I suspect, and the Latin, which I know he left. I have every day more satisfaction in these studies, whenever the business of the forum<sup>e</sup> permits. You will render me a most, I say, a most grateful service, if you will attend to this with the same diligence you use in things which you suppose me to have much at heart. At the same time I recommend to you the affairs of Pætus himself, for undertaking which he gives you the greatest thanks. I not only ask, but entreat you, at length to visit us.

<sup>b</sup> This may allude particularly to some expressions which it is probable Atticus had used in his acknowledgment of letter 17, where Cicero declares his strong affection for him.

BOOK II.

LETTER I.

of June, as I was going to Antium, among the gladiators of M. Metellus, I went. He delivered to me your letter, a narrative of my consulship, upon which I had previously given to you a book on the same subject, written in Greek, which he was to take to you. In yours first, you might say that I am in you. Although yours, which I appeared to me rather rough and that very negligence had the effect of, as they say of women, it was not having no perfume.

On the other hand, had exhausted the style of Isocrates, and all the sententious, and, in some measure, even Aristotle. This, as you mentioned, you just tasted at Coreyra; but when you received it from Cossinius not have ventured to send it you, liberally and critically examined Ionius<sup>1</sup>, to whom I had sent my narrative to describe the same events in style, told me in his answer from Corneius had not only not disposed of it but completely discouraged him.

I have confounded the Greek style who pressed me to give them they might embellish, have now none. If the book pleases you, to have it circulated in Athens, Greece. For it may possibly throw some splendour on my affairs. I will send the speeches you ask for, and some others, since you seem to be pleased with what I have written at the desire of certain young men. For, as your fellow-citizen Demosthenes, in those orations which are called Philippics, had shone forth, and emancipated himself from that abrupt and judicial manner of speaking, that he might appear more dignified and statesman-like; so it became me to see that there should be some orations of mine, which might be called consular; of which one was delivered in the senate on the 1st of January; the next to the people on the Agrarian law; the third on the subject of Otho<sup>2</sup>; the fourth in defence of Rabirius; the fifth on the children of the persons proscribed<sup>3</sup>; the sixth, when in the assembly I resigned my province<sup>4</sup>; the seventh, by which I drove out Catiline; the eighth, which I delivered to the people the day after Catiline's flight; the ninth, in the assembly on the day when the Allobroges gave their public testimony<sup>5</sup>; the tenth, in and dispersing of books must have been a work of great labour, and must have taken up a great deal of time.

<sup>1</sup> Otho had been the author of a law which appropriated a distinguished part of the theatre to the use of the knights. This Otho coming into the theatre during Cicero's consulship was hooted by the populace, and supported by the knights, so as to endanger a considerable uproar; upon which Cicero summoned the people to the temple of Bellona, where he addressed them with such effect, that, upon returning to the theatre, they joined their applause to that of the knights. The oration is not extant.

the senate on the fifth of December<sup>o</sup>. There are besides, two short ones, as it were fragments, on the subject of the Agrarian law. I will take care that you shall have this whole collection. And since not only my writings, but my transactions, afford you pleasure, in the same books you will see both what I have done, and what I have said. Otherwise, you should not have asked for them; for I did not present myself to you uninvited.

As to what you inquire about the cause of my sending for you; and signify, that though you are fettered with business, yet not only if it is necessary, but if I wish it, you will come to me; there is, in truth, no immediate necessity; but I thought you might arrange the season of travelling more conveniently. You are away too long, especially as you are at no great distance, and yet we do not enjoy the fruits of your company, and you are without us. At present all is quiet; yet if the madness of the pretty youth were allowed to proceed a little further, I should earnestly call you thence. But Metellus nobly prevents it, and will prevent it. What say you? He is a patriotic consul, as I always believed, and well disposed. But that fellow no longer dissembles, but openly professes his wish to be made a tribune of the people. Upon the question being agitated in the senate, I beat him down, and reproached him with his inconstancy, who at Rome was soliciting the tribunate, though at Hera, in Sicily, he had declared that he wanted to be made sedile. But I said it was not a thing about which we need give ourselves much trouble; for it would no more be permitted to him as a plebeian to ruin the state, than it had been to some, like himself, who were patriarians, when I was consul. Again, when he boasted in the assembly that he had come from the strait<sup>1</sup> in six days, and that nobody had time to come out to meet him, and that he had arrived in the night; I observed, that it was nothing strange that he should have come from Sicily to Rome in six days, who had gone from Rome to Interamna in three hours<sup>2</sup>; that it was not the first time he had entered by night; and that nobody had met and stopped him on a former occasion, when it ought more especially to have been done. What say you? I make an impudent man modest not only by a constant dignity of speech, but even by this kind of repartee. Now, therefore, I dispute and jest familiarly with him. For, as we were conducting one of the candidates, he asks me if I used to give a place to the Sicilians in the exhibitions of gladiators<sup>3</sup>? I said, no. "But I," says he, "their new patron, shall adopt this; though my sister, who has such consular space<sup>4</sup> allotted her, gives me but one foot." "Do not complain," said I, "of this one foot of your sister, for you are at liberty to lift up the other whenever you please<sup>5</sup>." You will say this is not a very consular speech. I confess it; but I hate her, ill deserving to be called consular; for she is a seditious woman, is at war with her husband, and not only with Metellus<sup>6</sup>, but with Fabius also, because she is displeased with the part they take on this occasion. In reply to your inquiry about the Agrarian law, it seems for the present to have cooled. As to the reproof you give me with a gentle hand respecting my familiarity with Pompeius, I would not have you imagine that I have united myself with him for the sake of my own security: but things were so circumstanced, that if by accident there should arise any disagreement between us, the greatest dissensions must have ensued in the republic: which I have guarded and provided against in such a manner, that I shall not depart from my just course; but he will become better, and lay aside something of his popular kvity. For, you must know, he speaks much more magnificently of my actions, against which many had endeavoured to excite him, than of his own. For to himself he bears testimony of having well administered the state; to me of having saved it. How far his doing this may be of use to me I know not; it is certainly of use to the republic. What if I make even Cæsar a better man, who is now in the enjoyment of such prosperous gales? Should I do any great injury to the state? But, if nobody envied me, if all favoured me as they ought, yet the remedy which could cure the unsound parts of the state, would not be less desirable than that which would cut them out. But now, when that body of knights, which I stationed on the Capitoline hill under your standard, has deserted the senate; and our chiefs think they have reached the skies, if they have but bearded mullets in their fish-ponds, which will come to their hands; and neglect everything else; do you not think that I render essential service, if I prevent them from doing mischief, who have it so much in their power? For you cannot esteem our friend Cato more than I do: but he, with the best intentions and the greatest integrity, sometimes does harm to the state, by delivering his opinion as if he were living in the republic of Plato, not in the dregs of Romulus. What can be more just than that one, who had received money for his sentence, should be brought into judgment? Cato gave his opinion to this effect, and the senate assented. The knights declared war against the senate, not against me, for I dissented. What could be more impudent than the appeal of the collectors? Yet for the sake of retaining the good-will of the order, the loss should have been submitted to. Cato resisted, and carried his point. The consequence has been, that when the consul was shut up in prison<sup>7</sup>; when seditions have at

<sup>w</sup> The exact meaning of the original is not obvious; but I conceive it to relate to the opposition which Metellus and Fabius gave to Clodius's design of making himself a tribune of the people.

<sup>x</sup> These were of the order of knights, who had made an improvident bargain for taking the rents of some of the subject provinces, and petitioned to have it cancelled. See book i. letter 17.

times been raised; not one of those men forwards, by whose concurrence I, and consuls who came after me, used to defend the public. What then! you will say, shall we have sold with a price? What shall we do, if we have them upon no other terms? Should we be submitting ourselves to freed-men, and slaves? But, as you say, enough of my zeal. I have found my tribe more favourably disposed to his own; that of Luccius he has lost. I sold Nasica ungenerously, and yet he spake gratefully, as if he had bestowed his pains, at the mills, rather than upon Molon<sup>a</sup>.

I found fault with me, because I had sold Nasica. Now, however, he is again a consul on behalf of the republic<sup>a</sup>. I will let that Luccius do when I shall have a consul, who will be here in two days' time. If the Sicilians should injure you, you may say Cato, and to his emulator, Servilius. I am not that stroke affect many good men? It must be so, let us commend it; only let us, in the dissensions of the state, be left alone. My Amalthea<sup>b</sup> expects you. My Tusculanum and Pompei-um exceedingly, excepting that they blamed me, the asserter of debts<sup>c</sup>, not an brass, but debts of this ordinary kind.

In Gaul I hope all is quiet. You are on to receive my Prognostica<sup>d</sup>, with me of orations. In the mean time what are your intentions about coming to the peninsula desired I might be informed of. I shall be at Rome in July. This does the letters you had written to me of your setting out.

Nothing can be more profitable to me than this; and I would I could secure the Latin as well as the Greek. I shall regard this as your gift. I have written to Octavius<sup>e</sup>. I had not spoken of your supposed your business to be nature, nor did I consider your concerns<sup>f</sup>: but I have written, as it all diligence.

LETTER II.

TAKE care, I beseech you, of our young Cicero<sup>a</sup>: we are his uncles, and ought, according to the Greek expression, to be his guardian deities<sup>b</sup>. I have been engaged in reading the Pellenæum<sup>c</sup>, and have a large pile of Dicaearchus's works before me. What a great man he is! One may learn from him much more than from Proclius. At Rome I believe I have his Athenais and Corinthiacs. If you take my advice you will read him. This I answer for, that he is a wonderful man. Herodes, if he were wise, would read him, rather than write one syllable of his own. He has shot at me by letter; and with you I see he has come to close quarters. I would sooner have been a conspirator myself, than have opposed the conspiracy, if I had thought it would be necessary to hear him<sup>d</sup>. You are mistaken about Lollius<sup>e</sup>; about Vinus I quite agree with you. But how is this? Do you observe that the Kalends are coming, and Antonius<sup>f</sup> is not come? That the judges are summoned? For so they inform me, that Nigidius threatens in the assembly to call to account any judge who absents himself. I should be glad however if you have heard anything about Antonius's arrival, that you would send me word. And since you do not come hither<sup>g</sup>, at least sup with me the day before the Kalends. Mind that you do not fail. Fare you well.

I IMAGINE I ought to present<sup>a</sup> my congratulations on Valerius's having been defended by Hortensius, and acquitted. This judgment was supposed to be granted to the favour of C. Atilius. I shall send you a copy of the decree of the senate in favour of all free states. See book I. letter 19.

<sup>b</sup> The occasion and circumstances of this letter, the place from whence it is written, or to which it is directed, the persons and the books named in it, are so little known, that it is involved in considerable obscurity. Cicero seems to be speaking of his nephew, who was also nephew to Atticus, and might possibly be unwell at Rome, while Cicero was at one of his villas. I have ventured to give to this passage a sense very different from that of any commentary I have seen; and I have done so upon the authority of Plutarch, in the conclusion of his piece entitled περί φιλαδελφίας, where he observes that the very word θεῖος, signifying at once "uncle" and "divine," leads to brotherly kindness and affection: δοκεῖ γὰρ μοι τὸ ὄνομα καλῶς ὑψηλοῦσθαι πρὸς εὐνοίας ἀδελφῶν καὶ ἀγάπης. Cicero therefore employs the Greek term, because the Latin did not bear this signification.

<sup>g</sup> We may suppose that this letter was addressed to Atticus at Rome, whither he was going without accepting Cicero's invitation to the villa whence he writes. Therefore, having missed him before, Cicero now appoints him to sup with him at Rome the day when he intended to go thither himself.

suspect too, that Epicrates<sup>o</sup>, as you say, may have grown wanton; for I did not like his military shoes, any more than his white bandages. We shall know what the case is when you come.

When you find fault with the narrowness of my windows, you must know that you find fault with the Institution of Cyrus<sup>p</sup>: for when I made the same observation, Cyrus said that the view of lawns through wide apertures was less pleasing. For, let the sight be A, the object B C, the rays D and E—you understand the rest. If we saw by the incidence of images<sup>q</sup>, the images might be much embarrassed in these narrow openings; but now the emanation of rays is made merrily. If you find fault with other parts, you will not find me silent, unless it be on some point which can be altered without expense.

I come now to the month of January, and to my particular situation and policy; in which we must, like Socrates, consider both sides; and then at last, like his disciples, choose what pleases us. It is truly a matter of great concern: for either a strong resistance must be made to the Agrarian law, in which there will be some fighting, but full of honour; or we must be quiet, which is the same thing as going out of the way to Solonim, or Antium; or else I must give it my support, which they say Cæsar so much expects from me, that he makes no doubt of it. For Cornelius has been with me, Balbus I mean, Cæsar's friend. He affirmed that Cæsar would follow mine and Pompeius's advice in all things, and that he would endeavour to unite Crassus with Pompeius. Here is the state of this business. I am intimately connected with Pompeius; if you please with Cæsar too. There is an opportunity of returning into favour with my enemies, of conciliating the populace, of securing tranquillity for my old age. But that former resolution of mine influences me, which is in the third book<sup>r</sup>—"In the mean time, that course which you pursued with virtue and spirit in early youth, and also as consul, you must still maintain, and grow in reputation and the praises of good men." Calliope herself<sup>s</sup> having dictated this to me in that book, which contains so many wholesome maxims, I think I ought not to doubt but that, in the words of Homer, "My best auspices should be to fight for my country." But let us reserve these considerations for our walks during the Compitalia<sup>t</sup>. Do not forget the day to the messengers of good news. The letter is generally supposed to have been written from the country to Atticus at Rome, in answer to one received from him communicating this intelligence. It seems to me more natural to suppose that Cicero might have heard it elsewhere, and that it wanted confirmation.

<sup>o</sup> This term is used to designate Pompeius, who appears to have affected some ambitious singularity of dress, and may have been suspected of interfering in the cause of Valerius.

before the Compitalia. I shall order the bath to be heated; and Terentia invites Pomponia: we will add your mother to our party. Bring me, from my brother Quintus's library, Theophrastus on the Love of Honour.

LETTER IV.

I AM very much obliged to you for sending me Serapion's work; of which, between ourselves, I scarcely understand a thousandth part. I have desired you may be paid for it in ready money; that you might not set it down among the expenses of your presents. But, having made mention of money, let me beg you to come to some arrangement with Titinius in any manner you are able. If he does not adhere to what he had professed, I should like best, if Pomponia agrees to it, that the things which are so dearly bought may be returned. If that cannot be done, let the money be paid, rather than have any altercation about it. I should be very glad to have you settle this before you go with your usual kindness and diligence.

Does Clodius then, as you say, go to Tigranes? Would it were on the same terms as Scæpius<sup>u</sup>! but I have no reason to object to it. For it will be a more favourable time for my absence on a few lieutenantancy<sup>v</sup>, when my brother Quintus, I hope, may be settled at his ease, and it may be known what that priest of the Bona Dea<sup>w</sup> is about. In the mean time I shall entertain myself with the Muses with an even spirit, nay, with cheerfulness and satisfaction. Nor will it ever enter my mind to envy Crassus, or to repent that I have been true to myself. I will endeavour to gratify you on the subject of geography; but I make no certain promise. It is a great undertaking; but yet, at your desire, I will try to let you have some fruit of my absence. Whatever you may have learned relating to the republic, especially whom you may think likely to be the consuls, let me know, though I am become less curious since I have determined not to trouble myself about public affairs.

I have been to see Terentia's wood. We want nothing but the Dodonean oak<sup>x</sup>, to make us think we have possession of Epirus itself. About the Kalends I shall be either in my Formianum or Pompeianum. If I should not be in the Formianum, come, if you love me, to the Pompeianum—it will give me great delight, and will be very little out of your way. I have ordered Philotimus to let the wall be done as you wished. I think, however, <sup>u</sup> Many conjectures have been formed respecting the true reading and the right interpretation of this passage. Gronovius proposes to read "Scæpiæ conditione," and observes that Metrodorus Scæpius was sent by Mithridates to Tigranes, and there lost his life. I have adopted his emendation, but have ventured to put upon it a new construction. After all, it is very doubtful.

<sup>w</sup> Cicero thought to absent himself from Rome during the time of Clodius's tribunate. He was expecting that his brother Quintus might be relieved from his government before another year, and might then keep a watch upon Clodius's operations.

LETTER VI.

WHAT I promised in a former letter, that some work should appear, the fruit of my retirement, I do not now very strongly confirm; for I am so attached myself to idleness, that I am not to be torn from it. Therefore I either amuse myself with books, of which I have an agreeable collection at Antium; or I count the waves, for the season is not favourable for catching lacertæ<sup>a</sup>. My mind quite revolts at writing. The geographical researches which I projected are a great undertaking; for Eratosthenes, whom I had intended to follow, is strenuously opposed by Serapion, and by Hipparchus. What think you, if Tyrannio<sup>a</sup> should join them? Besides, the subject is difficult to explain, and of a uniform nature, and less susceptible of any ornaments of writing than I had supposed; and, which is the chief of all, any cause is, to say the truth, sufficient to make me give it up. I am doubtful whether I shall settle here, or at Antium, to pass all this time<sup>b</sup>; where I would rather have been a duumvir, than have been consul at Rome<sup>c</sup>. You have done wiser in providing a home at Buthrotum. But believe me this town of Antium comes very near to yours. Could it be supposed there was any place so near Rome where there are many people who never saw Vatinus<sup>d</sup>? where there is nobody besides myself who cares if any one of the twenty commissioners<sup>e</sup> is alive and safe? where nobody interrupts me, and everybody loves me? Here then is the place to exercise my political talents: there I am not only prevented, but am weary of it. Therefore some private observations, which I may read to you alone, shall be drawn up in Theopompus's manner, or still more severely. I now trouble myself no further about the public, than to hate the wicked; and even that without anger, or rather with some pleasure in writing.

But to come to business: I have written to the city quæstors about my brother Quintus's affair. See what they say<sup>f</sup>; whether there is any hope of

<sup>e</sup> Vatinus was a factious tribune, who exerted himself this year in opposing the authority of the senate.

Roman money<sup>1</sup>; or whether we must be put off with the Pompeian cistophorus. Moreover, settle what is to be done about the wall. Is there anything else? yes: let me be informed when you mean to go from thence.

LETTER VII.

I WILL think again about the geography. You ask me for two orations: one of which I did not care to write out, because I had left it imperfect; the other, that I might not praise a person I did not like: but I will see about this also. However, there shall be something, that you may not think I have been totally idle. What you tell me about Clodius is highly agreeable to me; and I hope, when you come, you will bring me a full account; and that you will let me hear from you in the mean time, if you know, or suspect, anything; especially what he is likely to do about the embassy. Before I read your letter I was wishing to get at the fellow<sup>2</sup>, not forsooth that I might put off my engagement with him (for I am eager for the contest); but I thought he would lose whatever popularity he had acquired by being made a plebeian. "For what purpose have you passed over to the people? that you might go to salute Tigranes? Tell me; do the Armenian kings refuse to salute patricians?" In short I was prepared to work him upon this embassy; which if he slights, and if, as you say, that excites the indignation both of the framers and supporters of the law by which he was disabled, it will be a fine scene. But, to say the truth, our Publius (Clodius) is treated rather disrespectfully: in the first place, that he who was once the only man in Caesar's house, now should not have been able to be one among twenty: then, that one embassy should have been talked of, another should have been given; that rich one for the purpose of exacting money, is reserved, I suppose, for the Pisaurian Drusus, or the glutton Vatinius: this meagre and dainty banishment is given to him, whose tribunate is reserved to suit the occasions of these gentlemen. Inflame him, I conjure you, as much as possible. The only hope of safety is in the disagreement of these people among themselves, of which I learned some symptoms from Curio. Already Arrius complains that the consulate has been snatched away from him: Megabocchus<sup>3</sup>, and these sanguinary youths, are determined enemies. To this let there be added, yes, let there be added, that contest for the augurship. I hope often to send you fine letters upon these subjects. But I want to know what it is that you throw out obscurely; that already some of the quinqueviri<sup>4</sup> themselves are beginning to speak out. What is this? for if there is anything in it, it must be better than I had imagined. I would have you understand this, not as if I made these inquiries with any view of engaging myself in public affairs. I have long since been weary of steering the state, even when it was permitted me to do so: but now, when I am obliged to quit the ship, not throwing away, but taking in the rudder<sup>5</sup>, I wish from the land to look at the shipwreck of those people; I wish, as says your friend Sophocles, "from under my roof to hear the frequent dripping with a tranquil mind."

You will see what is necessary about the wall. I will correct the error of Castricius: yet Quintus had written to me 25,000<sup>6</sup> sesterii; now to your sister he says 30,000. Terentia salutes you. Cicero desires that you will answer for him to Aristodemus, in the same manner as you have done for his relation<sup>7</sup>, your sister's son. I shall not neglect your information about Amalthea<sup>8</sup>. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

WHILE I was eagerly expecting a letter from you in the evening, as I usually do, I was informed that the servants had arrived from Rome. I call them in, and ask if they have any letters. They say no. What do you say, said I, is there nothing from Pomponius? Alarmed at my voice and countenance, they confessed that they had received a letter, but had lost it on their way. What think you? I was very much provoked; for all your letters lately had brought some useful or agreeable information. Now, if there was anything deserving to be recorded in the letter you sent the 16th of April, write as soon as possible, that I may not remain in ignorance; or if there was nothing but good-humour, yet repeat even that. Know that young Curio has been here to visit me. What he said about Publius (Clodius) exactly agreed with your letters. He is wonderfully incensed against our haughty kings<sup>9</sup>. He said that the young men were equally angry, and could not bear this state of things. We are in a good way. If we can depend upon these people, let us, methinks, mind our own affairs<sup>10</sup>. I am engaged in history. At the same time, though you may think me another Saufeius<sup>11</sup>, nothing is more indolent than I am. But let me explain to you my motions, that you may determine where you will come to me. I design to go to Formianum the middle of April<sup>12</sup>. Then (since you think I ought to omit that delicate

<sup>2</sup> The expression implies that he did not abandon the state in anger, but withdrew his guidance till some more favourable season, when his services might be available.

<sup>2</sup> This sense appears to me sufficiently good, without altering the text in opposition to all MSS. Most commentators have thought fit to omit the preposition in, and to understand Cicero to say that he had wished Clodius might go to Tigranes.

<sup>3</sup> It is generally supposed that by this term is meant Pompeius, and that he was at variance with these young incendiaries, the remains of Catiline's accomplices.

basin<sup>2</sup> at this time) on the first of May I shall leave Formianum, that I may be at Antium on the third. For the games of Antium are to take place from the fourth to the sixth of May, and Tullia wishes to see them. Thence I think of going to Tusculanum, then to Arpinum, and to be at Rome on the first of June. Let me see you either in Formianum, or at Antium, or in Tusculanum. I replace your former letter, and add something ex.

LETTER IX.

I HOPE you are well. Cæcilius, the quæstor, having told me that he is going to send a servant, have written this hastily, that I might elicit your irrelevant dialogues with Publius, as well those which you mention, as that which you reserve, ring it is tedious to detail your reply; also that which has not yet taken place, which that Böopis<sup>1</sup> I relate to you upon her return from Solonium. would have you believe nothing can be more agreeable to me. If the agreement relating to me not kept I am in heaven<sup>2</sup>. This our Jerusalemite<sup>3</sup>, who brings matters before the people, I know what a fine return he has made for my recent speeches, of which you may expect a disunited counterpart<sup>4</sup>. For, as well as I can is, if that profligate<sup>5</sup> is in favour with these mighty men<sup>6</sup>, he will not be able to exult, not only the consular Cynic<sup>7</sup>, but not over those sons of the stewards. I can never be an object of envy when I am robbed of my power, and of all senatorial authority. But if he disagrees with me it will be absurd to attack me. However, let it be as he will. Believe me, this revolution in the has been made gaily, and with less noise than I supposed; more speedily indeed than seemed probable; and that, partly through the fault of but, besides, through the shameful conduct of one who neglected the auspices, the Ælian, the Licinian law, the Cæcilian, and the idian; who threw away all the resources of the tuition; who gave away kingdoms and estates in rards; and to a few persons immense sums of money. I see now to what party envy will pass and where it will abide. Think that I have done nothing either from experience, or from brastus, if you do not shortly see people call these our times. For if the authority of the senate excited envy, what do you think will be the case, when it is transferred, not to the people, but to three ambitious men? Therefore let them make whom they will consuls, and tribunes of the people; nay, let them clothe the evil of Vatinius<sup>1</sup> with the painted robe of the priesthood, you will shortly see not only those who have committed no offence, but even Cato himself, who is so guilty in their eyes, raised to great honour. As for myself, if your companion Publius permits it, I mean to act the philosopher; if he designs anything, then only to defend myself; and, as becomes that profession, "I announce that I will repel any one who first insults me." Only let my country be favourable. It has received from me, though not more than is due, at least more than was demanded. I prefer being ill rowed under the steerage of another, to steering well with such ungrateful rowers. But these things may be discussed better when we meet. Now hear the answer to your inquiry. I intend to go from Formianum to Antium the third of May; from Antium I wish to go to Tusculanum on the seventh of May. But as soon as I leave Formianum, where I mean to stay till the end of April, I will immediately let you know. Terentia sends her compliments. The young Cicero salutes the Athenian Titus<sup>2</sup>.

(Græc. xii.)

LET those men<sup>1</sup> deny, if they can, that Publius has been made a plebeian. It is a mere exercise of sovereignty, and is not to be borne. Let but Publius send persons to attest it, and I will swear that our Cnæus, when he was colleague with Balbus, told me at Antium, that himself had conducted the auspices on the occasion. What two charming letters have been delivered to me from you, both at the same time! I do not know what remuneration I can make for them; but that some is due I freely acknowledge. Observe the concurrence of circumstances. I had just gone from the Antian into the Appian road at the Tres Tabernæ, on the festival of Ceres<sup>1</sup>, when my friend Curio, coming from Rome, met me. At the same place presently came the servant from you with letters. Curio asked me if I had heard no news. I said, no. Publius (says he) is canvassing for the place of tribune of the people. What think you? He is very angry with Cæsar, and threatens to rescind all his acts. How does Cæsar receive it?

<sup>3</sup> This letter is the 12th in Grævius's edition, but is evidently misplaced, because it is alluded to in that which follows. This was written at four P. M. from the Tres Tabernæ, after Cicero had left Antium on his way to Formianum. The next was written at ten o'clock the same night from Appii Forum. The 12th after he was at Formianum.

said I. He denies that he proposed anything about his adoption. Then Curio declared his own hatred<sup>1</sup>, and that of Memmius and Metellus Nepos. I took my leave of the young man, and hastened to your letters. Where are they, who speak of viva voce information? How much more fully have I learned from your letters, than from his conversation, what was doing, what were the daily surmises, the intention of Publius, the trumpet of Böopis<sup>2</sup>, the standard-bearer Athenio, the letters sent to Cnæus, the conversation of Theophanes and of Memmius. Besides, what an expectation have you given me of that licentious feast! I am dying with curiosity. Yet I shall be satisfied without your writing me an account of that meeting, as I wish rather to hear it from your own mouth. As to your exhortation to write something; the materials indeed increase upon me, as you say; but the whole thing is yet in fermentation, and "during the autumn the wine is thick:" when it is settled, what I may write will be better digested. But if you cannot have anything at present, at least you shall be the first to have it, and for some time the only one. You do well to like Diccæarchus: he is an honest man, and not a little better citizen than those rulers of iniquity<sup>3</sup>. I have written this letter on the festival of Ceres, at four in the afternoon, the moment I had read yours; but with the intention of despatching it to-morrow by the first person I meet<sup>4</sup>. Terentia is delighted with your letter, and sends her kindest regards; and Cicero the philosopher<sup>5</sup> salutes the statesman Titus.

LETTER XI.

(Græc. x.)

PRAY admire my firmness. I do not mean to attend the games at Antium<sup>6</sup>; for it carries with it an appearance of inconsistency, while I wish to avoid every suspicion of luxury, suddenly to be seen travelling not only delicately, but unbecomingly. I shall therefore wait for you in Formianum till the 7th of May. Let me know what day I may expect to see you. From Appii Forum, 10 P. M. I despatched another letter a little before from the Tres Tabernæ<sup>7</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> This is meant of Clodia, [see letter 9 of this book,] who was urging her brother to extremities, as it were with a clarion or war-trumpet. The same figure is continued in applying to Athenio the term of standard-bearer of sedition: Athenio had been the author of an insurrection in Sicily. Under this name Cicero probably means Vatinius.

<sup>3</sup> In Greek δίκταρχος, which it is impossible to translate so as to preserve the opposition to the name Diccæarchus; the latter signifying "a ruler of justice," the former "rulers of iniquity."

<sup>4</sup> He was now on the Appian road, which was much frequented, and could not fail of presenting to him some person who would convey his letter to Rome.

<sup>5</sup> This is said in Greek, after the Greek manner, as if Cicero and Atticus had changed conditions; Cicero now seeking retirement, while Atticus remained in the throng and business of Rome.

<sup>7</sup> The Appii Forum and Tres Tabernæ derive an interest from the mention of these places in St. Paul's journey to Rome, Acts xviii. 15.

LETTER XII.

(Græc. xi.)

To tell you the truth, I seem as if I were banished since I have been in Formianum. While I was at Antium there was no day on which I did not know better what was doing at Rome, than these who were living there. For your letters acquainted me not only with the state of Rome, but with that of the republic at large; and taught me not only what happened, but also what was going to happen. Now, unless anything is picked up from a casual passenger, I can hear nothing. Therefore, though I hope very soon to see you, yet let me have, in the servant, whom I have directed immediately to come back, some long letter, full not only of what has been done, but likewise of your own opinions. Take care to let me know the day when you mean to leave Rome. I intend to remain in Formianum till the sixth of May. If you do not arrive before that day, I shall perhaps see you at Rome. For why should I invite you to Arpinum, "a rugged place (as Ulysses says of Ithaca); where a good nurse of youths; than which nothing in my eyes be more delicious." So much for the present. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

A PROVOKING circumstance, that nobody should have delivered the letter<sup>1</sup> I wrote to you from the Tabernæ the same hour that I received your acceptable intelligence. But you must know that the parcel in which it was contained was taken to my house<sup>2</sup> the same day on which I sent it, and from thence was brought back to me at Formianum. I have ordered this letter again to be taken to you, that you might be assured of the pleasure yours had given me. When you inform me that nothing is said in Rome<sup>3</sup>, this is what I expect. But, I can tell you, people are not reserved in country, nor can the country bear your<sup>4</sup> tyranny. But if you come into this Telepylus Læstrygon<sup>5</sup> (Formia I mean), what a noise do people make! How irritated are their minds! In what detraction is our friend Magnus<sup>6</sup>, whose appellation Great begins to decay with that of the Rich Crassus! Believe me, I have yet met with nobody who could bear this state of things so quietly as I do. Therefore pray let us continue to enjoy our philosophical retirement; for I can aver upon my oath,

there is nothing worth contending for. If you have got your letters to the Sicyonians*, hasten down to Formianum. I think of leaving it the sixth of May.

LETTER XIV.

How great an expectation do you raise in me about the discourse of Bibulus! How great about the conversation of Bœopis! How great also about that dainty entertainment! Come, then, yourself to my thirsty ears. Though there is now nothing which I should think more to be apprehended, than that our Sampsiceramus* when he perceives that he is lashed by the discourses of all people, and sees these proceedings so easily overset, may begin to rush into violent counsels. For my own part, I am dispirited to that degree, that I prefer being enslaved in this indolence, in which I now pine away, to contending with the best hope of success.

In the way of composition, to which you often exhort me, nothing can be done. I live in a court-house, not in a villa, owing to the throng of the Formians; for this Æmilian tribe would fill a court-house*. But I say nothing of the generality, who after ten o'clock cease to trouble me. But, ben, C. Arrius is my nearest neighbour; nay, he is now my very comrade, who even refuses to go to Rome, that he may philosophise here with me all the day long. On the other side is Sebosus, that friend of Catulus. Which way can I turn myself? would assuredly go immediately to Arpinum, if I did not perceive that you might be expected with most convenience in Formianum; but only till the sixth of May. For see to what people my attention is given up. It would be a fine opportunity if anybody wished now to purchase my Formian estate, while these people are about me. And should I attempt anything? Let us forsooth undertake some great work, of much research and labour! Nevertheless, I will endeavour to satisfy you, and will not spare my own pains.

LETTER XV.

SEE, as you tell me, that things are not less certain in the state than they are represented in the letter; but that very variety of reports and have given to this passage an interpretation somewhat different from that commonly received, because I find it more consonant to the usual phraseology of the great Romans, and to his own feelings, expressed in the 8 of this book:—"Alitid agamus."

Atticus had not been able to get from the people of the tribes which he had rented. [See book i. 19.] He appears to have staid in Rome to solicit aid from the Sicyonians for the payment of this money.

is generally agreed, that by this name, which recurs several subsequent letters, is to be understood Pompeius. The same occurs in Josephus as king of the Emesæ, per a prince conquered by Pompeius. It cannot but be every reader, that the names under which he is named in these letters should be so various, and often extraordinary; perhaps in derision of some affected air.

I understand the text of the original, which is by us clear, and may possibly be corrupt. Literally—what an Æmilian tribe (have I) equal to a court-house. The people of Formis being reckoned in the same tribe, are therefore called by that name.

opinions delights me, for I seem to be in Rome when I read your letters; and, as it always happens in affairs of such magnitude, to hear sometimes one thing, sometimes another. There is one circumstance I cannot comprehend, what he can possibly devise for carrying into effect the Agrarian scheme without any opposition. What results from that firmness of Bibulus in the postponement of the comitia, besides the exposition of his own opinion, without any correction of the evils of the republic? Our hope, then, is in Publius. Let him, let him be made a tribune of the people; if for nothing else, that you may the sooner come back from Epirus (for I take it for granted that nothing will prevent your going thither<sup>c</sup>), especially if he wishes for any contention with me. For I do not doubt, if there should be anything of this kind, you will hasten up. But if this should not be the case, whether he rush on to his own ruin, or whether he retrieve the condition of the state, I propose to myself a noble sight, if only it is permitted me to see it with you by my side.

As I was writing this, in comes Sebosus. I had hardly felt my vexation, when "Good morning," says Arrius. This is getting away from Rome! From whom is it I have escaped to fall into such hands? I must go "to my cradle and native hills<sup>d</sup>." In short, if I cannot be alone, I will rather live among mere rustics than with these mighty civil people. However, as you say nothing certain about your motions, I will wait for you in Formianum till the fifth of May. Your attention and diligence in the Malvian dispute<sup>e</sup> is extremely gratifying to Terentia. She is not aware that you are supporting the common cause of all who occupy the public lands. But you still pay something to the collectors of the revenue; she refuses even that. Both she, and the aristocratical<sup>f</sup> boy Cicero, send their compliments.

LETTER XVI.

THE thirtieth of April, as I was dozing after dinner, your letter was delivered to me, in which you speak of the Campanian lands. What think you? In the first place, it struck me in such a manner as effectually to remove my sleep; but this was through thoughtfulness rather than uneasiness. And the result of my thoughts is this; first, from what you had mentioned in a former letter, of having heard from one of Cæsar's friends that something was to be brought forward to which nobody would object; I had apprehended something greater. This did not appear to be of that kind. Then, for my consolation, all expectation of the Agrarian bounty seems to have centred in the <sup>c</sup> The meaning of the original has been variously understood. I have ventured to interpret it in a manner different from any that I have seen, and which appears to me sufficiently consonant with the Latin idiom, and with the context.

Campanian land; which, at ten acres a-piece, cannot maintain above five thousand men. All the remaining multitude must necessarily be alienated from them<sup>b</sup>. Besides, if there is any one thing more calculated than another to inflame the minds of good men, it is certainly this; and the more so, because the port duties being removed, and the Campanian land distributed, what domestic revenue remains besides the twentieth<sup>c</sup>? and this I suppose will, in one little meeting, be extinguished by the shouts of a mob. What our Cnæus intends, I know not, that he could be wrought to such a pitch: "for he now breathes through no little flagoelet, but with a full breath untempered by a reed<sup>d</sup>." Hitherto he pretended to approve Cæsar's laws, but to leave it to him to defend his acts: that he liked the Agrarian law; but whether intercession could be made or not was no business of his: that he was glad to have the affair of the king of Alexandria<sup>e</sup> at length concluded; but whether Bibulus had been observing the heavens<sup>f</sup> or not, it was not his duty to inquire: that on the subject of the farmers of the revenue, he had wished to favour the order of knights; but that it was impossible for him to guess what would happen if Bibulus came down to the forum<sup>g</sup>. But now, Sampiceramus, what will you say? that if you have taken away from us the tribute of the Campanian land, you have appointed it to be levied on Mount Libanus<sup>h</sup>? But how will you support this reasoning? I will keep you, says he, in subjection by Cæsar's army. But in truth you will not subject me so much by that army, as by the ungrateful spirits of those people who bear the name of good, but who have returned me no thanks, no recompense of reward, or even of good words. Should I put myself forward against that faction, I might yet find some means of opposing them. I have now made this resolution, that as there is so great a controversy between your friend Dicæarchus, and my friend Theophrastus<sup>i</sup>, the former preferring a life of business, the latter one of speculation, I will comply with both. Dicæarchus I have abundantly satisfied already; I now turn to that party which not only allows me to be quiet, but reproves me for not having always been so. Let us then, O my Titus, address ourselves to those noble studies; and at length return thither, from whence we ought never to have departed. What you say of my brother Quintus's letter to you, was equally true of that to me: it was "a lion in front, and behind<sup>j</sup>." I do not know what to call it; for at the beginning he deprecates his stay<sup>k</sup> in such a manner as to be quite affecting; presently he is so easy about it as to desire me to correct and publish his annals. I wish to direct your attention to what he says about the coast duties, and that he had, by the advice of his council, referred the business to the senate. It appears that he had not yet read my letter, in which, after due consideration, I had explained to him that they ought not to be exacted. I should be glad, if any Greeks<sup>l</sup> have yet come to Rome upon that account, that you would see them, and, if you think proper, would let them know my sentiments upon it. If I can manage so that this good cause may not be lost in the senate, I will endeavour to satisfy the renters<sup>m</sup>: but if not (I must speak openly with you), I prefer satisfying all Asia, and the traders; for it is also of great importance to them. This I consider myself bound to do. But you will see about it. Pray, do the quaestors hesitate even about paying in cistophori<sup>n</sup>? For, after having tried everything, I must be content with this ultimate resource, if there is no other. I shall be glad to see you in Arpinatum, and will give you a country welcome, since you despise this by the sea-side.

LETTER XVII.

JUST as you say, so I find it: Sampiceramus is disturbed: there is nothing that may not be apprehended. He is confessedly preparing the way to tyranny. For, what means that sudden alliance<sup>o</sup>? what means the distribution of the Campanian land? or the money that is squandered? If this were all, it would be more than enough; but such is the nature of the thing, that it cannot end here. For how should this afford any pleasure? They never would have brought matters to such a state, but for the sake of opening a way to other mischievous counsels. Ye immortal gods! But, as you say, in Arpinatum, about the thirteenth of May, we will not bewail these matters, lest all the time and attention we have bestowed on literature be lost; but we will calmly confer together. Nor do I, as formerly, derive consolation so much from any good hopes, as from indifference, which I exercise in nothing so much as in regard to civil and public affairs. Besides, I have a little vanity and conceit (it is well to know one's own faults), which is in some measure flattered; for it used to sting me to think, that, some six hundred years hence, the deserts of Sampiceramus towards his country might eclipse my own. There is now no longer room for this apprehension; for he is so sunk, that Phocis Curiana<sup>p</sup> is honourable in comparison. But of this when we meet. You seem to me, however, likely to be at Rome at the time of my arrival, which I shall not be sorry for, if it put you to no inconvenience. But if you do come, as you say, I wish you could get out from Theophrastus how Alabarches<sup>q</sup> is disposed towards me. You will make inquiry, therefore, with your usual accuracy, and bring me from him some documents.

as it were, by which I may regulate my conduct. We shall be able to learn something of the general state of affairs from his conversation.

[The foregoing letters were written from Cicero in the country to Atticus in Rome. This, and the following letters, were from Cicero in Rome to Atticus in the country.]

LETTER XVIII.

I HAVE received several letters from you, by which I find with what doubtfulness and anxiety of mind you wish to be informed what news there is. We are beset on all sides: and we now no longer refuse to be enslaved; but dread death and banishment as greater evils; which are in truth much inferior ones. And this state, which all with one voice deplore, is not relieved by a word from anybody. It is the aim of those in power, as I suspect, to leave nobody any favour to bestow. The young Curio<sup>a</sup> alone speaks out, and openly opposes them: he receives the greatest applause, is saluted in public with great honour, and has shown him many other marks of kindness; while Papius<sup>b</sup> is persecuted with hootings, reproaches, and hisses. From hence no hope is to be derived, but only the greater grief, when you perceive the will of the city free; its courage fettered: and that you may not have to ask after each particular in detail, the whole is reduced to such a state, that there is no hope, not only that individuals, but even that the magistrates can long remain free. But amidst this oppression, conversation, at least in private circles and companies, is less reserved than it was. Our grief begins to overcome our fear; yet so, that all is overwhelmed with despair. Even the Campanian law contains a denunciation, in the assembly of the candidates, against anybody who shall presume to mention any other occupation of the land, than as it is proposed by the Julian laws. The other candidates do not hesitate to swear to these conditions; Laterensis is thought to have acted wisely, in ceasing to solicit the tribunate, hat he might not be obliged to swear. But I do not care to say anything more about the republic: vex myself, and cannot write without the greatest pain. I support myself, considering this state of oppression, not dejectedly; considering what I have formerly done, not at all courageously.

I am very kindly invited by Cæsar into his province, as his lieutenant: a free lieutenantcy is also given me under colour of a vow<sup>c</sup>. But this is not sufficient security in the moderate counsels of his pretty youth<sup>d</sup>; and banishes me from my brother when he arrives: the former is safer, and does not prevent my coming up, when I wish it. I hold this, but do not think I shall make use of; and nobody knows it. I do not like to run away: I wish to fight<sup>e</sup>. The affections of people are very great; but I do not speak positively. You will keep this to yourself.

Respecting the manumission of Statius<sup>c</sup>, and some other matters, I am sorry indeed, but am now grown callous. I should be glad, or rather I should wish, that you were here: I should then want neither counsel, nor comfort. Be ready however, that if I call for you, you may fly to me.

LETTER XIX.

MANY things give me uneasiness, both from so great a commotion in the republic, and from the dangers which beset me individually, and are six hundred fold. But nothing vexes me more than the manumission of Statius: "that neither my authority; but I omit authority; not even my displeasure, should be respected<sup>d</sup>." I do not know what it is right to do: not that there is so much in the thing itself, as in the conversation it excites. I cannot be angry with those whom I greatly love; but I am sorry, indeed very sorry. As for other matters of more importance, as the threats of Clodius, and the struggles which are prepared for me, they affect me but little; for I conceive that I shall be able either to bear them with becoming dignity, or to avoid them without vexation. You will say perhaps, "enough of dignity; as they said of acorns, when they had found better food<sup>e</sup>;" think, I beseech you, of your safety." Alas! why are you not here? nothing would escape you. I am perhaps blinded, and am too much given up to a sense of honour. Be assured, nothing ever was so disgraceful, so base, so offensive to all orders, ranks, and ages, as this present state of affairs: more so than I could wish, not only than I could have expected. Those courtiers of the populace have now taught even moderate people to hiss. Bibulus is extolled to the skies. I know not why; but he is so praised, as if "he alone by his check restored the state to us<sup>f</sup>." Pompeius, my beloved, who now is my greatest pain, has been his own ruin: he retains not one supporter. I doubt whether it be through inclination, or fear, that he is obliged to join with them. For my own part, I neither fight with that cause, because of the friendship that subsists between us; nor do I approve it, lest I should condemn all that I have formerly done. I manage as I can. The sense of the people is clearly seen in the theatre, and public shows: for in the exhibition of gladiators, now the master, then the assistants<sup>g</sup>, were cut with hisses. In the Apollinarian games, Diphilus, the actor, attacked our friend Pompeius with petulance. He was obliged to repeat a thousand times that sentence, "you are great by our wretchedness:" and that—"the time will come when you will rue that courage," he pronounced with the shout of the whole theatre; and so of the rest: for the lines are such, that they seemed to have been composed for the

occasion by some enemy of Pompeius. "If neither laws nor morals compel," &c. was spoken amidst great shouts of applause. After Cæsar had come in amidst a dead applause<sup>1</sup>, the young Curio followed, and was cheered, as Pompeius used to be in the days of the republic. Cæsar was greatly disturbed. Letters were said to be hastily despatched to Pompeius at Capua: they<sup>2</sup> were angry with the knights who stood up to applaud Curio: they were at enmity with all the people; they threatened the Roscian law<sup>3</sup> and even the corn law<sup>4</sup>. It was altogether a confused business. For my part, I should have liked better that their attempts might pass over in silence; but I fear this is impossible. People do not bear what however it seems necessary to bear: but there is now one general voice amongst all, confirmed by hatred, rather than by security. In the mean time our Publius threatens me, and is an open enemy. There hangs over me that business, for which you will fly up<sup>5</sup>. I believe I have that consular host of all good men, even of all moderately good, firmly attached to me. Pompeius professes no common regard for me: at the same time he affirms that Clodius will not utter a word about me; in which he does not deceive me, but is himself deceived. Cosconius being dead, I am invited to fill his place in the commission for dividing the lands; that is, to supply the place of a dead man. Nothing would be more disgraceful for me in the eyes of men; nor would anything be less calculated for the very purpose of security. For these commissioners are ill looked upon by the good; so that while I retained the ill-will of the worst part of society, I should add to it that of the others. Cæsar wishes me to be his lieutenant. This would be a more honourable way of avoiding danger; but I now refuse this. How is it then? I choose rather to fight: however there is yet nothing determined. I repeat, that I wish you were here; but, however if there is any necessity, I shall send for you. What more? what? it is this, that we may depend upon all being lost. For why should I so long dissemble the truth? but I write this in haste, and with some reserve. Hereafter I will either write everything plainly to you, if I can find a trusty messenger to whom I may deliver my letters; or if I am obliged to write obscurely, yet you will understand it. In these letters I shall call myself Lælius, and you Furius: the rest will be in enigmas. I here diligently cultivate, and pay respect to Cæcilius<sup>6</sup>. I hear that the edicts of Bibulus have been sent to you. Our Pompeius is burning with vexation and rage on their account.

LETTER XX.

I HAVE done everything in my power for Anicetus, as I understood you wished. Numestius I have willingly received into friendship, from the

regard with which you mentioned him; Cæcilius I support in every way that I am able; Varro<sup>a</sup> gives me great satisfaction; Pompeius has a real love and affection towards me. Do you believe it? you will say. I do believe it; his conduct persuades me of it. But as I perceive practical writers, in all historical maxims, and even in verse, advise us to be cautious, and forbid to be credulous; I shall do one of these two, and be cautious; the other, not to believe, I cannot do. Clodius still denounces danger to me. Pompeius affirms that there is no danger; nay, he swears it; and adds even that he would sooner be killed himself, than I should be hurt. The affair is yet unsettled: as soon as anything is determined, I will let you know. If it is necessary to fight, I shall summon you to share my troubles: if I am permitted to be quiet, I will not disturb you from your Amalthea. I shall write to you very briefly upon public affairs; for I fear lest the paper itself should betray me. Hereafter therefore, if I have occasion to write more fully to you, I shall veil it in allegory. The state is dying by a new disease; so that while all people blame what is done, complain, grieve, entertain no difference of opinion, and even speak out, and openly lament; yet no remedy is offered. For we believe that no resistance can be made, which is not fatal; and that there is no end of yielding, besides ruin. Bibulus is exalted to the skies with the admiration and favour of the people, who copy and read his edicts and speeches. He is arrived at the height of glory by a new method; for nothing is now so popular, as hatred of the popular leaders: I fear what may be the issue of this. If I begin to see anything, I will write to you more openly. If you love me, as indeed you do, keep yourself in readiness, that you may come up if I call: but I endeavour (and shall do so) to prevent the necessity of it. As to what I said about calling you Furius, there is no need of changing your name. I shall make myself Lælius, and you Atticus; and I shall not use my own hand, or seal, provided the letters be of a kind which I should be sorry to have fall into other hands. Diodotus is dead: he has left me, perhaps, a hundred sestertia<sup>c</sup> (8000). Bibulus has put off the comitia, by an Archilochian<sup>d</sup> edict, to the seventeenth of October. I have received the books from Vibius<sup>e</sup>. He is a poor poet; and yet has some information: but upon the whole is not without his use. I shall have it transcribed, and send it back.

LETTER XXI.

ON the subject of the republic why should I write to you minutely? The whole is ruined: and in one respect is more wretched than you left it; for then the tyranny which oppressed the state

<sup>a</sup> This is the same Varro who was afterwards esteemed the most learned of the Romans.

<sup>c</sup> In the original it is centies, which would be 80,000, or 83,000; but it is probable the word may have been so copied by mistake for centum, which would make this bequest 833.

<sup>d</sup> Archilochus was a severe satirist, so that the expression signifies that these edicts reflected severely upon the triumvirate.

<sup>e</sup> It appears by the following letter, that these books contained the poems of Alexander. It is probable that Atticus might have sent them to Cicero by Vibius.

seemed at least to be liked by the common people ; and though a cause of trouble to the better sort, yet it did not threaten their ruin. Now it has suddenly become so hateful to every body, that I dread to think where it may burst forth ; for we have already experienced the rage and intemperance of those men, who in their anger against Cato<sup>1</sup> have overturned everything. But then they used such gentle poisons, that it seemed as if we might die without agony ; now I fear they will be rendered outrageous by the hisses of the populace, the language of the respectable citizens, the clamour of Italy. I had hoped, indeed, as I often used to say to you, that the wheel of the republic was so turned, as scarcely to be heard, scarcely to leave a track ; and so it would have been, if people could have waited to let the storm pass over : but after smothering their groans a long time, at last all have begun to speak, and to cry aloud ; so that my friend<sup>2</sup>, unused to reproach, always conversant with praise, and surrounded with glory, knows not where to turn himself in his present squalid appearance and broken spirit. He sees it dangerous to proceed, weak to retreat ; he has made good people his enemies, and has not even the bad for his friends. See now my tenderness of mind : I could not refrain from tears when I saw him, on the 22nd of July, addressing the people upon the edicts of Bibulus ; him, I say, who formerly used magnificently to exalt himself in that very place, with the greatest affection of the people, and universal applause. How was he then humbled ! how rejected ! how did he displease not only his audience, but himself also ! O spectacle ! agreeable to Crassus alone, not so to others. For having ended as it were, from the stars, it seemed a fall, rather than any advance. And as Apelles, when he saw his Venus, or Protogenes his Jalytus, sneered with mud, would, I conceive, feel great sin : so did I with great pain behold him, whom had painted and polished with all the colours of art, suddenly disfigured. Though nobody thought owed him any friendship for his conduct in the odian business ; yet such was my regard, that it is not to be exhausted by any act of unkindness. Bibulus's Archilochian edicts against him are so acceptable to the populace, that one cannot pass the place where they are exhibited, for the wrong of people who are reading them : to him they are so bitter, that he pines with vexation : to them they are distressing, because they give too much uneasiness to one whom I have always loved ; and I am afraid lest one so powerful, so used to his sword, and so unaccustomed to inactivity, should give way to grief and rage with all the force of his mind. What is likely to be the end of Julius, I cannot say ; at present he is in surprise. Upon his putting off the comitia to the month of October, Cæsar imagined that, this being a measure usually offensive to the people, he would be able, by addressing them, to persuade them willingly itself to go to Bibulus ; but after uttering many very seditious expressions, he could not act from them a single word. What say you ? triumvirs feel that they have the good-will of the party : so much the more reason have we to be the stern supporter of old principles. With Cato must be opposed to be included other inflexible politicians of the same time.

be afraid. Clodius is my declared enemy. Pompeius affirms that he will do nothing against me : it is dangerous to believe this ; therefore I prepare myself to resist him. I trust I shall have the best wishes of all orders. When the time comes, not only I shall want you, but the circumstances themselves will call for you : I shall gain a great deal of advice, of courage, and of protection, if I have you with me at that time. Varro gives me satisfaction ; Pompeius talks divinely. I hope I shall certainly be able to come off either with distinguished credit, or without mortification. Let me know what you are doing, how you amuse yourself, and how you have managed with the Sicyonians<sup>3</sup>.

LETTER XXII.

How I could wish that you had remained in Rome ! you would certainly have remained, if we could have foreseen what has happened : we could easily restrain our pretty youth<sup>4</sup>, or at least we should be able to know what he was about. But now, this is the state of the business ; he flies about, raves, follows no certain course, threatens many, and seemingly to act as chance may offer. When he sees the odium attached to the present state of affairs, he seems as if he would attack those who have occasioned it ; but when again he recollects their influence, and the strength of their army, he directs himself against me ; and to me he threatens both violence and prosecution. With him Pompeius has discoursed ; and, as he informed me himself, (for I have no other witness,) discoursed with vehemence, telling him that he should incur the utmost disgrace of perfidy and wickedness, if any danger should be brought upon me by him, whom he had himself invested with arms, when he suffered him to be made a plebeian ; but that he, and Appius, had received his promise on my behalf, and that if he did not observe it, he should resent it so, that the world might know nothing was dearer to him than my friendship. After saying this, and much more to the same purpose, he told me that Clodius first continued for some time to urge many things on the other side ; but at last gave up, and declared that he would do nothing contrary to Pompeius's wishes. Since then, however, he has not ceased to speak very severely of me ; and if he did not, still I should not trust him, but should prepare for everything, as I do. Now I conduct myself so, that every day my friends and my influence increase. I keep altogether clear from public concerns, and am busily engaged in causes, and the exertions of the forum. This I perceive is agreeable not only to those who use my assistance, but to the people generally. My house is frequented ; I am saluted ; the remembrance of my consulship is renewed. The favour of the people is manifest ; and I am in such hope, as sometimes to think the struggle which hangs over me is not a thing to be declined. I have now need of your advice, your affection, and fidelity ; therefore fly up ; every thing will be easy to me, if I have but you. Much may be done through our friend Varro ; but it will be strengthened by your support. Much may be got from Publius himself ; much may be known, which cannot be kept secret from you; much also—but it is idle to enumerate each particular; I shall then want you for everything. Be assured of this, that everything will be plain when I see you; but all depends upon its being before he enters upon his office. While Crassus is urging Pompeius, I imagine if you are here (who by means of Bôpis* may learn from Clodius himself with what sincerity they are acting) I shall either be free from trouble, or, at least, free from error: you do not need my entreaty and exhortation. You see what my wishes, what the occasion, what the importance of the case requires. Of the republic I have nothing to write to you, but the great hatred of all people towards those who have possessed themselves of everything; yet no hope of any change. But, as you may easily perceive, Pompeius is tired, and heartily repents. I cannot sufficiently foresee what issue is to be expected; but these rancours must assuredly burst forth somewhere. I have sent back to you the books of Alexander; a careless writer, and no good poet, yet not without his use. I have willingly received Numerius Numestius into my friendship, and have found him a sensible and prudent man, and worthy of your recommendation.

LETTER XXIII.

I BELIEVE you never before received a letter from me that was not written in my own hand. From that you may judge how much I am occupied: for having no spare time, and yet being obliged to walk about for the sake of recruiting my voice, I dictate this as I walk. In the first place then I would have you know, that our friend Sampsicramus is heartily sick of his situation, and wishes he could again be restored to that place, from which he has fallen. He imparts to me his uneasiness, and sometimes openly seeks a remedy; which it is impossible for me to find. Then, all the authors and adherents of that faction are losing their vigour; while there never was a more general consent in the wishes and expressions of all people. As for myself (for I know you will be glad to be informed), I interfere in no public counsels, and give myself up altogether to the business and labour of the forum; by which, as may easily be supposed, I am brought to the frequent relation, and regret, of my former deeds. But that kinsman of our Bôpis casts no little terror, and threatens; and while he denies it to Sampsicramus, to others he professes and boasts of it; therefore if you love me, as indeed you do, if you are asleep, wake up; if you are standing, walk; if you are walking, run; if running, fly. It is not to be believed how much (which is the most possible) I place in your counsels and prudence, how much in your affection and fidelity. The greatness of the occasion requires perhaps a long discourse; but to minds so united as ours, a few words are sufficient. It is of great importance to me, if you cannot be at Rome on the comitia, at least that you may be there when he is declared tribune. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

In the letter I sent by Numestius, I called upon you with an earnestness and vehemence, which nothing could exceed; to that call add even, if you can, something more. Do not make yourself uneasy (for I know you, and am aware of the solicitude and anxiety inseparable from real affection); but the case, as I hope, is less formidable in fact, than it seems in the relation. Vettius (the same who gave information at the time of my consulship) had promised Caesar, that he would contrive to bring the young Curio into some suspicion of criminality. He therefore insinuated himself into the familiarity of the young man; and having, as it appears, frequent meetings with him, he at length brought matters to such a state, that he declared his determination to assault Pompeius with the assistance of his slaves, and to kill him. Information of this was given by Curio to his father, and by him to Pompeius. The affair was brought before the senate. Vettius being introduced, at first denied that he had ever been concerned with Curio; but this did not last long: for he presently demanded a public pledge of security upon his giving evidence; this was not opposed. Then he gave out, that there had been a band of young men under the conduct of Curio; amongst whom had originally been Paullus, and Q. Cæpio Brutus, and Lentulus, the son of the flamen, not without the knowledge of his father; that afterwards C. Septimius, the secretary of Bibulus, had brought him a dagger from Bibulus: which was all absurd; as if Vettius would have been without a dagger, unless the consul had given him one! And this was the more scouted, because on the 13th of May Bibulus had warned Pompeius that he ought to be upon his guard, and Pompeius had thanked him for it. Young Curio being introduced, deposed in answer to what Vettius had said; and Vettius was then chiefly convicted by his own assertion, that it had been the advice of the young men to attack Pompeius in the forum with the gladiators of Gabinius; and that Paullus was at the head of it; though it was known that he was at that time in Macedonia. A decree of the senate was then passed, that Vettius should be put in prison for having confessed that he had carried arms; and that whoever liberated him would be an enemy to the republic. The general opinion of this affair was, that it had been designed Vettius and his slaves should have been apprehended in the forum with a dagger and with arms; and then he should have offered to confess. And this would have been done, if the Curios had not previously given information to Pompeius. The decree of the senate was then read in the assembly of the people; but the next day Caesar, who formerly, when he was prætor, had obliged Q. Catulus to speak from below*, now brought Vettius forwards on the rostra, and placed him in a situation, to which the consul Bibulus was not permitted to aspire†. Here he said whatever he pleased about the republic; and having come ready prepared, he first omitted any mention of Cæpio, whom he had named with acrimony in the senate; so that it was manifest the night, and some nightly management, had intervened; in the next place, he named some, whom in the senate he had not touched with the slightest suspicion; as Lucullus, from whom he said C. Fannius used to be sent to him; the same who had set his name to the accusation of P. Clodius; also L. Domitius, whose house had been fixed upon as the place from whence their eruption might be made. He did not name me; but mentioned that a certain speaker, of consular rank, and neighbour to the consul<sup>a</sup>, had suggested to him, that some Ahala Servilius<sup>a</sup>, or Brutus<sup>a</sup>, must be found. He added at last, upon being called back by Vatinius, after the assembly was dismissed, that he had understood from Curio, that my son-in-law Piso, and M. Laterensis, were privy to these machinations. Vettius was at this time charged before Crassus Dives for violence; and upon being found guilty, meant to claim the benefit of turning evidence; which if he had obtained, it was probable several trials would have followed. This did not much alarm me, who, however, am not used to disregard anything. Indeed, I had the strongest marks of favour shown me; but I am quite weary of my life, so full are all things of all sorts of miseries. A little while ago we had been apprehensive of a massacre, which the speech of that firm old man Q. Considius<sup>b</sup> had dispelled; that which we might have apprehended every day, has suddenly sprung up. What think you? Nothing is more unfortunate than I; nothing more fortunate than Catulus<sup>c</sup>, both from the splendour of his life, and from the character of these times. Yet in the midst of these calamities, I preserve a firm and unruffled mind, and maintain my dignity honourably and carefully. Pompeius bids me lay aside all uneasiness on the subject of Clodius; and on every occasion professes the greatest kindness towards me; but I want you to direct my counsels, to share my anxieties, and to take part in all my thoughts. Therefore, as I desired Numestius to use his influence with you, so I beg you even more earnestly, if possible, to fly up to us. I shall get no life if I see you.

Ahala Servilius had killed Sp. Melius on suspicion of stirring to kingly power.

Brutus, as is well known, had been the cause of quinilius's being driven from the throne, and of the extinction of the regal power.

Cæsar had committed some acts of violence, and had led the assembly with armed men, when the law was passed which gave him the government of Gaul for five years. Many senators absented themselves; but Considius came forward, saying, that he was too old to fear him.

Q. Catulus had died the year before.

LETTER XXV.

WHEN I commend one of your friends to you, I like him to know from you, that I have done so. As lately, when I wrote to you of Varro's attention to me, you said in return that you were very glad of it; but I would rather you had written to him, to assure him that I was sensible of his kindness; not so much because he actually gave me satisfaction, as that he might continue to do it; for, as you know, he has wonderfully moderated those involved and unwholesome counsels. But I observe that maxim, that it is necessary to bear the extravagances of those who are in power: while your other friend Hortensius<sup>d</sup>, with how full a hand, how nobly, how eloquently has he raised to the stars my praises, in speaking of the prætorship of Flaccus, and that time of the Allobroges! Believe me, nothing could have been said more kindly, more honourably, or more copiously. I wish you would write to inform him that I have mentioned this to you. But why should you write? when I imagine you are coming yourself, and are almost here; so much have I urged you in former letters. I very much look for you, very much want you; and not I, more than the cause itself, and the time, call for you. On the present state of affairs what should I write to you, but a repetition of the same thing? Nothing can be more hopeless than the condition of the republic; nothing more hated than those who have occasioned it. So far as belief, and hope, and conjecture go, I am supported by the strongest favour of all people. Fly up, therefore; you will either extricate me from all uneasiness, or you will share it with me. I am the shorter, because I hope we shall very soon be at liberty personally to converse together as we please. Farewell.

<sup>d</sup> In the original it is Hortalus, which was one of the names of Hortensius; but being less commonly known, I have not thought fit to preserve it in the translation.

[In the interval between this and the following letters, Atticus went up to Rome at his friend's request. Clodius in the mean time having been appointed tribune of the people, spared no means to gain the populace, and at length promulgated a decree against such as had put to death a Roman citizen without the sentence of the people. This was evidently levelled at Cicero's conduct in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy; upon which, seeing the disposition of men's minds, he withdrew from the city, and was presently followed by a decree of banishment.]

LETTER I.

(Græc. iii.)

WISH I may ever see the day when I shall reason to thank you for compelling me to save my life; hitherto I am very sorry. But treat you to come to me immediately at Vibo, which place many causes have directed me. If I come thither, I shall be able to consult about my whole journey and flight. If you refuse to do so, I shall be surprised; but I trust you will

LETTER II.

THE reason of my coming hither was, that there was no place where I could any longer remain unmolested so well as on Sica's estate; especially while the law for my banishment had not yet been finally amended. At the same time I knew that I could easily go back to Brundisium, if I had you with me; but without you I could not continue in those parts, on account of Autronius<sup>e</sup>. Now, as I mentioned to you before, if you come to me, we will consult upon this whole business. I know the journey is troublesome; but this great calamity is full of troubles. My spirits are too much broken, and depressed, to admit of my writing more. Farewell. Dated the 8th of April, from the shores of Lucania.

LETTER III.

(Græv. iv.)

I WOULD have you attribute it to my misfortunes, rather than to fickleness, that I have suddenly left Vibo, whither I had invited you; for I have received a draft of the law for my ruin; by which I find that the amendment I had heard of, permits me to remain at any place exceeding the distance of four hundred miles. But not being permitted to go where I had intended<sup>1</sup>, I immediately turned my course towards Brundisium, previously to the passing of the law, lest I might involve Sica, with whom I was staying, in my ruin; and also because I was not suffered to be at Malta. Now make haste to join me, if only I can meet with any one to take me in. Hitherto I have met with a kind reception; but I am apprehensive of what is to come. I repent, my Pomponius, of being yet alive; in which matter you have principally influenced me. But of this when we meet: only manage to come.

LETTER IV.

(Græv. i.)

As I before thought it of importance to have you with me,—so especially, upon reading the form of the law, I understood that nothing could happen more desirably for the journey I determined upon, than that you should join me as soon as possible: that after leaving Italy, in case my road should lie through Epirus, I might have your protection and that of your friends; or if anything else were to be done, might regulate my measures by your advice. I beg, therefore, that you will take pains to join me without delay. You may do it the easier, since the law respecting the province of Macedonia<sup>2</sup> has been passed. I would use further arguments with you, if the state of affairs did not itself speak to you on my behalf.

LETTER V.

TERENTIA often acknowledges her obligations to you in the strongest terms; which is highly gratifying to me. I live in great wretchedness, sided, so as to render it unsafe for him to proceed to Butthrotum, (where we may suppose that Atticus had offered him an asylum,) unless he had the protection of Atticus's presence. Brundisium was the port from whence people passed to Greece. Vibo was opposite to Sicily.

and am worn out with excessive grief. I know not what to say to you: for if you are still in Rome you cannot now come up with me; and if you are on your road, as soon as you have come up with me we shall arrange together what is to be arranged. I only beg that you will continue in the same affection you have always borne me,—for I am still the same. My enemies have taken away from me my goods, but not myself. Farewell. Dated the 10th of April, at Thurium<sup>3</sup>.

LETTER VI.

I HAD not doubted but I should see you at Tarentum or Brundisium. Many reasons made me wish it; among the rest, that I might stop in Epirus and take your advice on the rest of my affairs. Since this has not happened, I shall place this also in the long catalogue of my misfortunes. I shall proceed into Asia, particularly to Cysicum<sup>4</sup>. I commend my family to you. I hardly and wretchedly support myself. Dated the 18th of April, from the neighbourhood of Tarentum.

LETTER VII.

I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 18th of April. The same day your servant delivered to me your letter; and, the third day after, another servant brought me another letter. Your kindness in inviting and pressing me to go to your house in Epirus, is very gratifying to me, and nothing new, and what I should wish to do if I might spend my whole time there<sup>1</sup>; for I dislike places that are frequented: I avoid mankind, and can hardly bear to see the light. That retirement would not be unpleasant to me, especially in so familiar a place; but to turn aside for the sake of making an excursion thither, is, in the first place, out of my way; then it would expose me to Autronius, and the rest of that set, for four days' journey,—and would, besides, be without you. For a fortified castle, if I were living there, might be desirable; to a mere passenger would be useless. If I dared I would go to Athens: I certainly should like it: but at this time many of my enemies are there,—and I have not you with me; and I fear they may interpret even that city to be not sufficiently distant from Italy; nor do you say on what day I may expect you. By calling upon me to preserve my life, you produce only this effect,—of preventing me from laying hands on myself; you cannot prevent my repenting of my determination, and of my life: for what is there that should attach me to it? especially if there is no longer that hope which accompanied me in my flight. I will not attempt to enumerate all the miseries into which I have fallen through the extreme malice and wickedness not so much of my enemies as of my enviers, lest I should exasperate my own grief and bring you into the same distress. This I affirm, that nobody was ever affected with so heavy a calamity, nobody had ever more reason to wish for death,—the most honourable time for which has already passed by; the time that remains may bring an end to my trouble, but not a remedy. On the subject of the republic I see you collect every thing which you think can afford me any hope of a change of circumstances. Little as this is, yet, since you will have it so, let us wait for it. In the mean time, if you make haste you will yet be able to join me; for I shall either go into Epirus or shall pass slowly through Candavia<sup>1</sup>. My doubt about Epirus is not owing to my irresolution, but to my uncertainty where I may meet with my brother, whom indeed I know not how I shall be able either to see or to take leave of. This is the greatest and saddest of all my miseries. I would write to you oftener, and more at length, if my grief did not take away all the powers of my mind, and above all the power of writing. I long to see you. Farewell. Dated the 30th of April, at Brundisium.

LETTER VIII.

On leaving Brundisium, I informed you why I did not go into Epirus; because of its vicinity toreece, which was full of daring enemies, and cause the passage out was difficult when I might wish to leave it. Besides this, I received two messages while I was at Dyrrachium<sup>1</sup>,—one to say that my brother would go by sea from Ephesus to Athens; the other that he would go by land through Macedonia. I sent therefore to Athens, to desire that he would come from thence to Thessalonica<sup>2</sup>; I went myself to Thessalonica, where I arrived the 23d of May. I have heard nothing certain at his journey, except that he had a little before Ephesus. I am now full of alarm about the meetings at Rome<sup>3</sup>; for though you tell me, in a letter dated the 15th of May, that you had heard he was likely to be brought to a severe account, in another letter that things were now more favorable,—yet this last is dated a day earlier than the other, which adds to my uneasiness: so that my daily trouble distresses and wastes me, additional vexation leaves me scarcely any life remaining. But the voyage is a very difficult one; from his uncertainty where I might be, he perhaps have taken a different course. For to, his freedman, has not seen him; but being driven back by the wind into Macedonia, he met me at Pella. I see how much reason I have to be what is to come, nor do I know what to say, afraid of everything; for there is nothing so probable that may not happen in my present circumstances. Wretched enough before in my great miseries and sorrows, with the addition of this new vexation, I remain at Thessalonica in suspense, and have no courage for anything. Now, in answer to your inquiries, I have not seen Trypho Cæcilius. Your conversation with Pompeius I have understood from your letter. I do not see so great a commotion to hang over the republic, as you either see or represent with a view of comforting me; for the business of Tigranes having passed over, all difficulties seem to be removed<sup>4</sup>. You desire me to return thanks to Varro, which I will do, and likewise to Hypæus. I think of following your advice in not going further off till the decrees of May are brought to me, but where I shall remain I am not yet determined; for I am so uneasy about Quintus that I can resolve upon nothing: but I will immediately let you know. From the irresolution apparent in my letters, I imagine you perceive the disturbance of my mind; which, though I am afflicted with an inconceivable and heavy calamity, is not however so much owing to the greatness of my misfortune as to the recollection of my own fault,—for you now see by whose iniquity I have been led on and betrayed. I wish you had perceived it sooner, and had not, with me, given up your whole mind to grief. When, therefore, you hear of my being oppressed and worn out with sadness, remember that I am more affected with the penalty of my folly than with the event itself; that I should have trusted him without suspecting his wickedness. The sense of my misfortunes, and apprehension for my brother, stop my writing. See after and regulate all these matters. Terentia returns you the greatest thanks. I have sent you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 29th of May, at Thessalonica.

LETTER IX.

My brother Quintus having left Asia before the first of May and reached Athens on the fifteenth, was obliged to make great haste, that his absence might not expose him to difficulty, in case there should be anybody not yet satisfied with the sum of my misfortunes. I wished him, therefore, rather to hasten to Rome than to come to me. At the same time (for I will confess the truth, from which you may perceive the greatness of my sufferings) I could not bring my mind either to look upon him, who was so tenderly attached to me, under the effect of such affliction, or present before him, and suffer him to behold, my own wretchedness sunk in grief, and my ruined condition. I dreaded also, what would certainly have happened, that he might be unable to quit me. I contemplated the time when he would either be obliged to dismiss his lictors<sup>1</sup>, or would be forcibly torn from my embrace. The effect of this bitterness I have avoided by another bitterness, of not seeing my brother. You, who made me preserve my life, have driven me into this situation. I now pay the penalty of my error; though your letters encourage me,—from which I easily perceive the amount of your own hopes. These indeed afforded me consolation, till you came to that part,—“after Pompeius, now gain over Hortensius, and people of that description.” I beseech you, my Pomponius, do you not yet see by whose means, by whose treachery, by whose baseness, I am ruined? But of this we will talk when we meet. I only say, what I imagine you know, that it is not my enemies, but my enviers, who have undone me. Now, if indeed things are as you hope, I will support myself, and use my best endeavours, with that hope which you bid me entertain. But if, as it appears to me, things are fixed and settled, what I was not permitted to do in the best manner must be done in one less becoming<sup>1</sup>. Terentia often acknowledges her obligations to you. One of my troubles in apprehension is the business of my poor brother. When I know how this will be determined, I shall know what I ought to do. The expectation of letters, and of those advantages which you hold out, keeps me, as you advise, at Thessalonica. If any news arrives, I shall know what is hereafter to be done. If, as you mention, you left Rome on the first of June, we shall very soon meet. I send you the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 13th of June, at Thessalonica.

<sup>1</sup> Clodius had, in consideration of a large sum of money, contrived to get the son of Tigranes out of Pompeius's custody, though not without a struggle, in which some lives were lost. This was likely to have caused a division among the triumvirs, Clodius being supported by Caesar. But it seems to have passed over.

LETTER X.

WHAT has taken place, up to the 25th of May, I have learned from your letters; the rest I waited to hear at Thessalonica, as you advised. When this account arrives, I shall more easily be able to determine where I shall be; for if there is occasion, if anything is done, if I see any hope, I will either remain where I am, or will go to your house in Epirus. But if, as you say, these prospects should have vanished, I must make some other arrangement. Hitherto you show me nothing besides the disagreement of those people<sup>2</sup>,—which, however, relates to everything rather than to me. I do not see, therefore, how this can help me: still as long as you encourage me to hope, I will obey you: for when you charge me so often and so severely, and upbraid me with want of courage, I beseech you, what evil is there which does not enter into my calamity? who ever fell at once from such a lofty state? in so good a cause? with such force of talents, and wisdom, and favour? such support from all honest men? Can I forget what I was? Can I help feeling what I am? what honour I have lost? what glory? what children? what fortunes? what a brother? whom (to teach you a new species of calamity) though I loved him, and have always loved him, more than myself, yet I avoided seeing, that I might neither be witness to his grief and mourning, nor present myself to him in ruin and affliction, whom he had left in the height of prosperity. I omit other grievous considerations,—for I am prevented by tears. And ought I then to be reproached for my sadness? or rather for having committed so great a fault as not to retain these advantages (which might easily have been done, if plots for my destruction had not been laid within my own walls), or at least not to lose them but with my life? I have mentioned this, that you might rather relieve me, as you do, than that you should think me deserving of reproach and blame. And I write the less to you, because I am interrupted by my sorrows; and in truth I have more to expect from thence than to say myself. If any intelligence is brought me, I will acquiesce with my determination. I wish you to write to me, as you have hitherto done, about everything, that I may not remain in ignorance on any point. Dated the 18th of June, at Thessalonica.

<sup>1</sup> Alluding to his death. Suicide was not then held to be either a crime or a disgrace. Cato and Atticus adopted it in perfect conformity with the principles of their respective sects. Cicero here, as elsewhere, plainly exposes one leading principle of the Academics, to whose sect he belonged, that when they were unable to do what they considered to be best, they ought to do that which was next best.

LETTER XI.

YOUR letters and some favourable reports, though not on the best authority, and the hope of hearing further from you, and your advice, have all kept me at Thessalonica. When I shall have received the letters I expect, if there is indeed that hope which has been encouraged by rumours, I will go to your house; if it is otherwise, I will take care to inform you what I do. Continue to assist me as you do with your exertions, your advice, and influence. Have done with consolation, and cease to upbraid me. When you do so, I seem to have lost your affection, and to have lost your sympathy; whom I conceive to be so affected with my misfortunes, that you are yourself inconsolable. Support my excellent and kind brother Quintus. I beg you to write to me fully everything that may be depended upon. Dated the 28th of June.

LETTER XII.

YOU argue seriously about what may be hoped, especially through the senate; and at the same time you add, that the clause of the law (for my banishment) is stuck up<sup>1</sup>, by which nothing is allowed to be said, and accordingly nothing is said. In this state of things do you blame me for being afflicted? while I am, as you yourself know, in such affliction as nobody ever felt. You hold out hopes from the new elections; but what hope is there with the same tribune of the people<sup>2</sup>, and a hostile consul elect<sup>3</sup>? I am much hurt about the speech<sup>4</sup> which has been brought forward. Try if possible to heal this wound. I wrote it long since in anger, because he had first attacked me; but I had so suppressed it, that I never imagined it would get abroad. How it should have got out I do not know; but as it never happened that I had any dispute with him in person ; and as it seems to me to be written more carelessly than my other speeches, it may possibly be concluded not to be mine. I should wish, if you think I can by any means be re-established, that you would do what you can in this business ; but if I must needs be undone, I am less solicitous about it. I continue still in the same place, without any power of conversing, or thinking. Though, as you mention, I had expressed a wish that you might come to me at Dodon<sup>2</sup> ; yet I understand that where you are<sup>3</sup>, you are of real use to me, and that here you could not relieve me by one word of comfort. I am unable to write more ; nor indeed have I anything to say. I expect rather to hear from you. Dated the 17th of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIII.

(Græc. xiv.)

FROM your letters I am full of expectation about Pompeius, what he may intend, or declare concerning me ; for I imagine the comitia are over : after which you mention that he wished to have my use considered. If my hopes make me appear foolish to you, I entertain them by your desire, though I am aware that your letters have rather been calculated to check me and my expectations. I should be glad now to hear distinctly what you think. I know that I have fallen into this trouble by the many faults I have committed. If any chance should in any degree rectify them, I shall be less regret that I have lived, and continue to live. On account of the constant communication this road, and my daily expectation of news, I have not yet moved from Thessalonica ; but I am driven away, not by Plancius<sup>4</sup>, (for he would rather keep me,) but by the nature of the place itself, which is ill calculated to bear the pain of such solitudes. I did not go into Epirus, as I had mentioned, because lately all accounts and letters agreed that there was no occasion for my being near Italy. Therefore, as soon as I hear the result of the elections, I shall go into Asia, though I am not yet certain to what place ; but you shall know. Dated the 21st of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIV.

(Græc. xiii.)

AFTER seeing my hopes diminish, and at length, I changed my intention, which I had mentioned to you, of going into Epirus ; nor have I moved from Thessalonica, where I determined to remain till I should hear something from you about what you mentioned in your last letter ; that something would be proposed in the senate on my behalf, soon as the comitia were over ; and that Plancius had told you so. Wherefore, since the elections are passed, and you say nothing, I thence infer it the same as if you had written to tell me nothing was done : nor shall I regret having been led by the hope of so near a termination<sup>5</sup>. But as to the commotion which you said you foresaw, and which seemed likely to turn to my advantage, they who have lately arrived, say there will be none. My remaining hope is in the tribunes elect. If I wait for this, you will have no reason to think me inattentive to my interest, and to the wishes of my friends. When you blame me for bearing my misfortunes so heavily, you ought to excuse me, seeing that I am afflicted as you never saw, or heard any one to be. For as to what you say you hear of my grief having turned my head, my head is sound enough. I wish it had been so in the time of my danger, when I was so unkindly and cruelly treated by those whom I supposed to have been my friends : who, when they saw me begin to waver in my resolution, urged me on in such a manner as to use all their wickedness and perfidiousness to my destruction. Now, since I am going to Cyzicum, where I shall have fewer opportunities of receiving letters, I hope you will be the more particular in letting me hear everything which you think I ought to know. Continue to love my brother Quintus. If in my own wretchedness I leave him safe, I shall not esteem myself wholly ruined. Dated the 5th of August.

LETTER XV.

ON the 13th of August I received four letters from you : one, in which you reproach me with want of firmness ; another, in which you mention that a freedman of Crassus had told you of my anxiety and emaciation ; the third, in which you inform me what has been done in the senate ; the fourth, about what you say Varro had confirmed to you respecting the disposition of Pompeius. To the first I reply, that my grief is so far from affecting my understanding, that it is an additional source of grief to have no opportunity, no person with whom I may employ that understanding which is unimpaired. For if you cannot without uneasiness lose me alone, what do you suppose I must feel, who lose you and everybody ? And if you, who are living in security, yet want me, how do you suppose I must want that very security itself ? I do not care to enumerate all that has been taken from me ; not only because you are already acquainted with it, but also that I may not aggravate my affliction. This I affirm, that nobody was ever bereft of such great advantages, or ever fell into such miseries. Moreover, time does not only not mitigate this distress, but even augments it. Other troubles are softened by age ; this cannot fail daily to increase, both from the sense of actual misery, and from the recollection of my past life : for I want not merely my goods, and my friends, but myself. For what am I ? But I will not be the occasion either of distressing your mind with lamentations, or of handling, oftener than is necessary, my own wounds. For as to exculpating those whom I mentioned to have injured me, and among the rest, Cato ; I am so far from imagining him to be implicated in that crime, that it is a great source of trouble to me that the pretences of others should have had more weight with me than his honesty. The others whom you exculpate, ought to stand excused by me, if they are so by you. But about these things we trouble ourselves too late. As for Crassus's freedman, I imagine he is not sincere in anything he has said. You describe the business to have been well managed in the senate. But what says Curio? Has he not read that <sup>b</sup>speech which has been brought forward I know not from whence? Axius, however, giving me an account of the transactions of the same day, does not so much commend Curio. But he may have omitted something: you have assuredly said nothing beyond the fact. The conversation of Varro affords some hope of Cæsar. I wish Varro may himself engage in my cause; which I am persuaded he will do, both of his own accord and from your solicitation. Should fortune ever restore me to the possession of you and my country, I shall certainly endeavour to give you, of all my friends, the greatest cause to rejoice at it; and shall so fulfil the demands of duty and affection, (which have before, I confess, been too little manifested,) that you shall think me restored to you, no less than to my brother and my children. If I have in anything behaved ill towards you, or rather since I have done so, pray pardon me; for I have behaved much worse towards myself. I do not write this because I am not fully aware of the part you bear in my great affliction; but, in truth, if the regard you have and have had for me, had been deserved on my part, you never would have suffered me to remain in want of that prudence in which you abound; nor would you have suffered me to be persuaded that it was to my advantage to have the law concerning the companies<sup>c</sup> carried through. But you administered to my grief nothing but tears, the effect of your love; as I did myself. Whatever might have been effected, had I possessed claims upon you to consider day and night what I ought to do; that has been omitted, not through your fault, but mine. But if not merely you, but anybody, when I took alarm at the ungenerous reply of Pompeius<sup>d</sup>, had called me back from that disgraceful counsel<sup>e</sup>, which you of all people was most able to do, I should either have fallen with honour, or should now live victorious. You must forgive me what I say; for I accuse myself much the most: next I accuse you as another self, and at the same time an associate in my fault. If I am restored, I shall think myself even less to blame; and shall certainly possess your affection through your own kindness, since it will be independent of any received from me.

Concerning the conversation which you mention to have had with Culeo on the invalidity of a private law<sup>f</sup>; there may be something in it; but it is much better to have it abrogated. For if nobody prevents it, what can be more secure? Or if anybody should not allow it to be carried, the same decree of the senate will still operate to invalidate it. Nor is there need of anything else besides the abrogation; for the former of Clodius's two laws did not affect me<sup>g</sup>. And if at the time of its promulgation, I had either thought fit to approve it, or, as it deserved, to disregard it, it could have done me no harm. Here first my judgment failed, or rather injured me. I was blind, I say; blind in changing my habit, and supplicating the people; which, unless I should have been attacked by name, was prejudicial to me. But I am going back to things that are past. It is however with this view, that if anything is done in this business, you may not meddle with that law which contains many popular enactments. But it is foolish in me to prescribe what you should do, or how. I only wish something may be done; on which subject your letter is rather reserved, lest, I suppose, I should feel my disappointment too severely. For what do you see possible to be done? or by what means? By the senate? But you have told me yourself that Clodius had fixed upon the door-post of the senate-house that clause in the law which makes it illegal to reconsider it, or to speak of it. How then is it that Domitius has said he would move for its reconsideration? or how is it that Clodius should have been silent, while some, as you mention, were speaking of that affair, and demanding its reconsideration? But if anything is to be done by the people, can they act without the concurrence of all the tribunes of the people! What of my goods? what of my house? Can that be restored? or if not, how am I myself restored! Unless you see some means of solving these difficulties, what is the hope to which you call me? And if there is no hope, what is life itself? I shall therefore wait at Thessalonica for an account of the transactions of the 1st of August, from which I may determine whether I shall take refuge in your grounds, (that I may both avoid seeing people whom I do not like, and may, as you say, see you, and be nearer at hand in case anything is done,) and this I understand you and my brother Quintus to advise, or whether I shall go to Cyzicum. Now then, my Pomponius, since you have exerted so portion of your prudence for my safety; either because you supposed that I was sufficiently capable of judging for myself; or that you owed me nothing more than merely to be ready on my behalf; and since I have been betrayed, prevailed upon, seduced to neglect all my supports; have disappointed and deserted all Italy, ready to rise in my defence; have given up myself, my friends, into the power of my enemies; while you looked on in silence, who if your judgment was not better than mine, at least had less to fear, raise up, if you can, my afflicted friends, and in this yet assist me. But if all means are obstructed, let me be informed even of that: and cease at length either to chide me, or civilly to offer me consolation. If I meant to accuse your want of faithfulness, I should not trust myself in preference to your roof. No, I accuse my own folly, in supposing that your love for me was equal to my wishes. Had this been the case, you would have shown the same fidelity, but greater care; and certainly would have held me back when I was hastening to my ruin; nor would you have encountered those troubles which you now sustain in my shipwreck. Take care then to let me know everything clearly and distinctly; and help me, as you do, to be again somebody, since I can no longer be what I was, and what I might have been.

appears to have applied this general principle to Cicero's particular case.

And believe that it is not you, but myself, that I accuse in this letter. If there are any, to whom you think letters should be sent in my name, I should be glad if you would write, and take care to have them delivered. Dated the 19th of August.

LETTER XVI.

ALL my motions are rendered uncertain from nothing else but the expectation of your letter of the 1st of August. If it affords any hope, I shall go into Epirus; if not, to Cyzicum, or some other place. The oftener I read over your letters, the more my hopes decline; for the reading them rekindles the hope they were meant to excite: so that it is very evident you are actuated by a regard to my consolation and to truth. I, therefore, beg you distinctly to tell me what you know, as it really is; what you think, as you really think. Dated the 21st of August.

LETTER XVII.

THE accounts I had received about my brother Quintus had been unfavourable, and without variation, from the 4th of June to the 31st of August. On that day Livineius, the freed-man of Regulus, came to me from his master: he reported that no mention of my brother's administration had been made; but that there had been some talk about a son of Caius Clodius<sup>1</sup>. He also brought me a letter from my brother. The next day Sestius<sup>2</sup> arrived with your letter, not so free from apprehension as the verbal communication of Livineius. In truth, I am very anxious in the midst of my own great distress, and the more so, because the question will come before Appius. The other terms which you mention in the same letter, relating to my hopes, seem to be less flattering than what I hear from other people. But, since time is not far distant when the business must be determined, I shall either go to your house<sup>3</sup>, or shall still remain in this neighbourhood. My brother tells me that you alone are the support of his concerns. Why, then, should I exhort you to what you do already? or why should I thank you, which you do not desire? I wish that fortune may enable us again to enjoy our mutual affection in security. I am particularly anxious for your letters. You be under no apprehension that your minutes can be troublesome to me, or your candour inexpressible. Dated the 4th of September.

LETTER XVIII.

YOU had raised in me no little expectation, you mentioned that Varro had told you in confidence, that Pompeius would certainly undertake my cause; and that as soon as he should have returned from Caesar, which he was expecting, he would get somebody to propose it. Was there Clodius had two brothers, Caius and Appius. The latter died, leaving two sons; the latter is the same afterwards spoken of in this letter.

Latin is "ad te." Many instances might be produced to justify this translation. It is similar to what is in the Acts, xvi. 40, πρὸς τὴν Αὐλίας, meaning "to his house."

nothing in this? or has Caesar's letter proved unfavourable? Is there anything to be hoped? You mentioned also that he had said something would be done at the time of the comitia<sup>1</sup>. Let me, if you see in what straits I am, and if you think it becomes your kindness, let me be informed of the whole matter. For my brother Quintus, an excellent man, who is so much attached to me, sends accounts full of hope, fearing, I suppose, my want of courage. But your letters are various; for you would not have me to despair, nor too hastily to hope. I entreat you to let me know everything that you are able to discover.

LETTER XIX.

AS long as I continued to receive from you such accounts as gave me reason to expect anything further, I was detained at Thessalonica by hope and anxiety: but when all the business of this year seemed to be finished, I did not care to go into Asia, both because company is disagreeable to me, and if anything should be done by the new magistrates, I should be sorry to be out of the way. I have, therefore, determined to go to your place in Epirus; not that the nature of the place was of any consequence to me, who altogether shun the light; but I should go with peculiar pleasure from your port to my restoration; or, if that is cut off, I can nowhere more easily support this wretched life, or, what is far better, throw it up. I shall have only a few people with me, and shall dismiss the great body of them. Your letters have never raised my hopes so much as those of some other friends; yet have my hopes always been less even than your letters. Nevertheless, since a beginning has been made, however it has been done, or from whatever cause, I will not disappoint the sad and mournful requests of my excellent and only brother, nor the promises of Sestius<sup>2</sup> and others, nor the hope of that afflicted woman Terentia, nor the entreaties of the poor dear Tullia, and those of your faithful letters. Epirus will afford me either a passage to restoration, or what I have mentioned above<sup>3</sup>. I beg and beseech you, my Pomponius, as you see me spoiled of all my splendid, cherished, and enjoyable possessions, by the perfidy of certain people; as you see me betrayed and cast forth by my counsellors; and know that I am compelled to ruin myself, and all that belong to me; that you will assist me with your compassion, and support my brother Quintus, who may yet be saved; that you will protect Terentia and my children; that you will wait for me, if you think there is any chance of seeing me there<sup>4</sup>; otherwise, that you will come to visit me, if possible, and will assign me so much of your land as my body can occupy<sup>5</sup>; and that you will send me servants with letters as soon as possible, and as often as you can. Dated the 16th of September.

<sup>4</sup> That Atticus should wait for Cicero at Rome, if he saw any chance of his recall; otherwise that he should go to see him in Epirus before he executed his resolution of killing himself.

LETTER XX.

CICERO salutes Q. Cæcilius, the son of Quintus, Pomponianus Atticus*. That this should be so, and that your uncle should have discharged this duty to you, I exceedingly approve: I would say that I rejoiced at it, if I could use this word. Alas! how would everything be according to my mind, had it not been for want of courage, of prudence, of honesty, in those whom I trusted: which I care not to recollect, lest I add to my regret. But I am sure you must remember the life I led; how many delights it contained, how much dignity. To recover this, I beseech you by your fortunes†, strive as you do; and enable me to spend the birth-day of my return with you and with my relations in your delicious house. I wished to have stayed at your place in Epirus for this hope and expectation, which is held out to me; but the letters I receive make me think it more convenient to remain where I am. Respecting my house, and Curio's speech, it is as you say. The general restoration, if only that be granted, will contain everything. But there is nothing about which I am more anxious than my house. However, I mention nothing to you in particular; I commend myself wholly to your affection and fidelity. It is very gratifying to me, that in so great an inheritance‡ you should have been able to extricate yourself from all trouble. When you promise your services on my behalf, that on every occasion I may derive assistance from you, rather than from anybody else, I am very sensible how great a support this is; and I know that you undertake, and are able to sustain, many kind offices for my preservation; and that you need not be entreated to do so. When you forbid me to suspect that I had either done or neglected to do anything towards you, which could give you offence; I will comply with your request, and free myself from that source of uneasiness: nevertheless, I am indebted to you so much the more, in proportion to the excess of your kindness towards me, over mine towards you. I beg you to tell me what you see, what you hear, what is done; and to exhort all your friends to assist me. The proposed law of Sestius is deficient both in dignity and caution: for it ought expressly to name me, and to mention more particularly my effects; and I should be glad if you would attend to this circumstance. Dated the 4th of October, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XXI.

THE day on which I write this, is the thirtieth since I have received any letter from you. It had been my intention, as I before mentioned to you, to go into Epirus, and there wait for whatever might happen. I beg you, if you see anything either way, that you will distinctly inform me; and that you will write in my name, as you propose, any letters which you may think necessary. Dated the 28th of October.

* Atticus having been adopted by his uncle Q. Cæcilius, and made his heir, is addressed by this new designation conformable to the custom of his country.

† A form of adjuration used particularly by persons in distress.

‡ Corn. Nepos states the amount to be centies H.S., equivalent to 83,333.

LETTER XXII.

THOUGH my brother Quintus and Piso had acquainted me with the state of affairs; yet I wished that your engagements had not prevented you from writing, as usual, about what was doing, and what conclusions you drew from it. The hospitality of Plancius has hitherto retained me, when I have several times attempted to go into Epirus. He has entertained the hope, which I cannot say I have, that we might be able to go away together; which he expects may do him honour. But now that soldiers are said to be coming, it will be necessary for me to leave him. When I go, I will immediately write to inform you where I am. Lentulus by his kindness towards me, which his actions, his promises, and his letters declare, affords some hope of the good disposition of Pompeius. For you have often told me in your letters, that he was entirely under Pompeius's influence. My brother has written to me about Metellus, how much he hoped had been effected through you. My dear Pomponias, exert yourself that I may again be permitted to live with you and with my friends; and write to me everything. I am oppressed not only with grief, but with the want of all that was dearer to me than myself. Farewell!

As I knew if I went through Thessaly into Epirus I should be a long while without intelligence, and as I have friends at Dyrrachium, I have come to them, after writing the former part of my letter at Thessalonica. When I set out again for your place, I will let you know; and I trust you will send me an exact account of everything, of whatever kind it may be. I now look for the thing itself, or lose all hope. Dated the 26th of November, at Dyrrachium.

LETTER XXIII.

ON the 27th of November I received three letters from you; one dated the 25th of October, in which you encourage me to wait with firmness for the month of January*, and say everything that can lead to hope; such as the zeal of Lentulus, the good-will of Metellus, and the whole design of Pompeius. In another letter, contrary to your custom, you do not mention the date: though you sufficiently mark the time by saying that you write on the same day on which the law was promulgated by the eight tribunes†; that is, the 29th of October; and you add what advantage you conceive that promulgation to have produced. From which, if my restoration is become desperate by the fate of this law, I should hope, for your love of me, you will esteem this fruitless diligence of mine rather unhappy than absurd; but if there be indeed any hope, that you will use your endeavour to make the new magistrates hereafter exert themselves with greater diligence in my support. For that proposed law of the old tribunes comprised three heads ; one for my return, which was incautiously drawn up ; for by it nothing is restored besides my citizenship and my rank ; which, considering my condition, is a great deal ; but what ought to have been secured, and in what manner, cannot have escaped you*. The next head is copied from the ordinary form of indemnity, in case anything should be enacted in support of this law, which was contrary to other existing laws. As for the third head, observe, my Pomponius, with what design, and by whom, it was inserted. For you know that Clodius added such sanctions to his law as should put it almost, or altogether, out of the power either of the senate, or of the people, to invalidate it. But you know also that the sanctions of laws which are abrogated, are never regarded. Were it otherwise, scarcely any could be abrogated ; for there is none which is not enced round by some obstacle to its repeal. But when a law is repealed, that very clause is repealed, which was meant for its security. Notwithstanding this is so, and has always been so held and observed, our eight tribunes have inserted this clause : " If there be anything contained in this law, which by any laws or decrees, that is, which by the Clodian law, it is not, and shall not be, strictly lawful to promulgate, abrogate, diminish, supersede ; or which subjects to a penalty, or is thereupon, whosoever hath promulgated, abrogated, diminished, or superseded it ; nothing of which kind is enacted by this law." And this could not affect those tribunes ; for they were not bound by the enactment of their own body : which affords greater suspicion of some malice, that they could have inserted what was immaterial to themselves, but prejudicial to me ; that the new tribunes the people, if they were at all timid, might think still more necessary to use the same clause. It has been overlooked by Clodius : for he inserted in the assembly on the 3rd of November, that under this head was prescribed to the tribunes what was the extent of their authority. But we are aware that no law has any clause of this kind ; which, if it were necessary, all would have gone to abrogate a former law. I wish you could find out how this should have escaped Ninnius and the other tribunes, and who introduced and how it happened that eight tribunes of the people should not have hesitated to bring my cause before the senate. Or can it be that* they, who ought this clause might be disregarded, should at the same time be so cautious in abrogating it, to be afraid of that, when they were free from law, which need not be observed by those who are bound by the law ? This clause I certainly did not wish the new tribunes to propose : but when they enact what they will ; the clause which is mine, provided the thing be accomplished, satisfies me. I am already ashamed of having been so much about it : for, I fear, by the time I read it, the thing will be past hope, so that no concern may appear to you pitiful, to others glorious. But if there is anything to be hoped, at the law which Visellius drew up for Titus, which pleases me exceedingly : for I do adding to his house and property.

There is confessedly some error in the text. I propose to read " Sive sitne qui." The alteration of " qui" for " sive" is very little, and seems to me to make the sense of the whole passage clear and consistent.

not like that of our friend Sestius*, which you say you approved. The third letter is dated on the 13th of November, in which you explain sensibly and accurately what it is that seems to delay my business ; about Crassus, Pompeius, and the rest. I beg you, therefore, if there is any hope that it can be accomplished by the wishes, the authority, the collected numbers of honest men, that a general push may be made ; attend to this, and excite others. But if, as I too plainly see, both by your suspicions and my own, that there is really no hope ; I pray and beseech you to love my brother Quintus, whom I have wretchedly ruined ; and not to suffer him to adopt any measures which may be inexpedient for your sister's son. As for my poor Cicero, to whom I leave nothing but ill-will and disgrace, protect him as well as you can†, and support by your kind attention Terentia, of all women the most afflicted. I shall go into Epirus as soon as I have received the intelligence of the first day's proceedings. I hope you will inform me in your next letter how the beginning passed off. Dated the 30th of November.

LETTER XXIV.

WHEN you mentioned to me before, that the provinces of the consuls had been appointed with your approbation‡ ; though I was afraid how this might turn out, yet I hoped your better judgment might have seen some reason for it. But since I have heard, both by word of mouth and by letter, that this proposal of yours is very much blamed, I have been deeply concerned ; inasmuch as that little hope, which remained, seems to be taken away. For if the tribunes of the people are offended, what hope can there be ? And they may with reason be offended, when they, who had undertaken my cause, have been left out of consideration, and by our concession have lost the exercise of their just rights : especially when they declare that they wished for my sake to have the power of making out the appointments of the consuls ; not that they might throw any impediment in the way, but that they might attach them to my cause : but that now, if the consuls are ill disposed towards me, they may show it without constraint ; or if they should be inclined to support me, still they can do nothing without the concurrence of the tribunes. For as to what you say, that unless my friends had consented, they would have attained the same purpose through the people§ ; this could not be done against the sense of the tribunes¶ : so that I fear we may have lost the good-will of the tribunes ; or, if that still remains, that the bond of union with the consuls may have been lost. Another no small disadvantage attached to this is, that the

* See letter 20 of this book.

† This seems to have been said under the idea of destroying himself.

‡ Atticus had no other concern in it than as being one of Cicero's principal friends and agents at Rome. It seems that the appointment of the provinces was a check upon the conduct of the consuls, which was exercised in great measure by the tribunes. By having the appointment previous to their entering upon their office, the tribunes lost this control, and the consuls became independent.

§ This had been done in the case of Caesar.

¶ Any one of the tribunes might interpose to stop the progress of a law in the popular assembly.

solemn resolution, as it was represented to me, that the senate would pass no act before my cause was determined, has been broken; and that, on an occasion which was not only unnecessary, but quite unusual and novel. For I do not believe that the provinces were ever before appointed for the consuls elect. Hence that firmness, which was shown in my behalf, having been once infringed, there is nothing now which may not be decreed. It is not surprising that this should have pleased those friends to whom it was referred: for it would be difficult to find anybody who would openly give an opinion in opposition to such advantages of the two consuls. It was impossible not to favour either so friendly a man as Lentulus, or Metellus, who so kindly laid aside his resentment. But yet I fear whether we may be able to keep these, and may not have lost the tribunes of the people. How this has turned out, and what is the state of the whole business, I wish you to inform me; and with your usual frankness. For the truth itself, though it may not be agreeable, is yet acceptable to me. Dated the 10th of December.

LETTER XXV.

SUBSEQUENT to your departure<sup>c</sup>, I have received letters from Rome, by which I perceive that I must pine away in this sad condition. For (you will pardon me) if any hope of my re-establishment had remained, such is your affection, that you would not have gone away at this time. But that I may not seem ungrateful, or willing that everything should be sacrificed along with me<sup>d</sup>, I say no

<sup>c</sup> From Rome. It is generally agreed by commentators that the words "a me" ought to be omitted. If they are retained, I should still understand it to mean "since you left my affairs at Rome." For the tenor of these letters forbids the supposition of Atticus's having been with Cicero.

<sup>d</sup> It is probable that Atticus might have written to say that some business called him away from Rome at this time; to which Cicero replies, that he would not be more upon the subject. This I beg of you, that you will endeavour, as you promised, wherever I may be, to stop your progress before the first of January.

LETTER XXVI.

I HAVE received a letter from my brother Quintus with the decree of the senate concerning me. It is my intention to wait for the passing of the law<sup>e</sup>; and if there is any malignant opposition, I will avail myself of the authority of the senate, and will rather lose my life, than my country. Pray make haste to come to me.

LETTER XXVII.

I SEE by your letters, and by the case itself, that I am utterly lost. I beg that in any concerns in which my family may stand in need of your assistance, you will have compassion upon my wretchedness. I hope, as you say, that I shall shortly see you.

[The law for Cicero's recall was for some time obstructed by the tribune Serranus, who had been gained over by Clodius. At length, however, it passed on the 14th of August, Cicero having already embarked for Italy, and arrived at Brundisium, where, three days afterwards, he received intelligence of the law having been reëdited with great zeal and unanimity by all the centurians.]

thought to wish that Atticus should sacrifice everything for his sake.

<sup>e</sup> The decrees of the senate had not the force of a law till they were confirmed by the people. But the law of Cicero's banishment having been carried by illegal means, the senate had on this occasion passed a vote, "that if, through any violence, or obstruction, the law for his recall was not suffered to pass, within the five next legal days of assembly, Cicero should be at liberty to return, without any further authority."—Life of Cicero, p. 168.

BOOK IV.

LETTER I.

As soon as I came to Rome, and met with anybody to whom I could properly entrust a letter to you, I thought nothing deserved my earlier attention, than sending to congratulate with you upon my return. For I had found, to tell you the truth, that in giving me advice, you were as much in want of fortitude and prudence, as myself; and considering my former attachment to you, that you had not been over diligent in protecting my safety. Yet you, who had at first partaken of my error, or rather madness, and had been the companion of my false alarm, bare our separation with much uneasiness, and spared no pains, no exertion, diligence, or trouble, to bring about my restoration. And I may truly affirm, that amidst the greatest joy, and most wished-for congratulations, the only thing wanting to complete my satisfaction, is to see, or rather to embrace you; whom once possessed, I hope never again to leave. If I do not make amends also for all the neglected fruits of your kindness<sup>e</sup> in the time that is gone by, I shall verily think myself undeserving of this return of fortune.

I have already obtained, what I conceived most difficult to be recovered in my situation, that distinction in the forum, that authority in the senate, and favour among good men, in a greater degree than I could have hoped. But in regard to my property, which, as you know, has been violated, dissipated, and plundered, I am in great difficulty; and I stand in need, not so much of your money, which I look upon as my own, but of your advice, in gathering up and securing the remains of it.

<sup>e</sup> This likewise derives explanation from book iii, letter 15, where Cicero declares that his future attentions to Atticus shall make up for any past deficiencies.

Now, though I imagine that everything has been either related to you by your friends, or brought by messengers and common report; yet I will shortly describe what I think you will most wish to be informed of by my own letters. I left Dyrrachium the 4th of August, on the very day when the law passed for my recall. On the 5th I came to Brundisium, where my dear Tullia was ready to receive me on her birth-day, which happened also to be the anniversary of the foundation of the Brundisian colony, and of the temple of Public Safety in your neighbourhood. This was noticed by the populace, and celebrated with great rejoicing. On the 8th of August, while I was at Brundisium, I heard from my brother Quintus, that the law had been confirmed in the assembly of centuries<sup>1</sup>, with an astonishing zeal among all ranks and ages, and an incredible concurrence of all Italy. Thence, having been honoured by the principal people of Brundisium, as I pursued my journey I was met by messengers of congratulation from all parts. On approaching the city there was nobody of any order of citizens known to my nomenclator<sup>1</sup>, who did not come to meet me, excepting those enemies, who could not either dissemble, or deny their hostility. When I arrived at the Capenan gate<sup>1</sup>, the steps of the temples were filled with the lower classes of people, who signified their congratulations with the loudest applause; and a similar roar and applause attended me quite to the Capitol: and in the forum, and in the capitol itself, the numbers were prodigious. The day following, which was the 5th of September, I returned thanks to the senate. These two days the price of provisions being very high, the people collected multoously, by the instigation of Clodius, first the theatre, then at the senate, crying out that had occasioned the dearth of corn. At the same time, the senate having met upon the subject of supplies, and Pompeius being called upon by a voice, not only of the populace, but of the other sort, to provide for it, and being himself desirous of it, and the people calling upon me by me to propose a decree for that purpose, I did so, and explained fully my sentiments, in the presence of others of consular rank, who said they did not with safety declare their opinions, excepting Messala and Afranius. A decree of the senate was accordingly passed agreeably to my proposal, that Pompeius should be engaged to undertake the business, and that a law should be enacted in. Upon the recital of this decree, when the populace, according to this silly and new custom, had given their applause, repeating my name, I harangued the assembly by the permission of the magistrates present, excepting one prætor and two tribunes of the people. The next day there was a full senate, and all the consular senators attended whatever Pompeius asked for. Upon his naming fifteen lieutenants, he named me at the head of them, and said that I should be in every other self. The consuls drew up a law, giving to Pompeius the power of regulating the trade all over the world for five years. Messius the most dignified assembly of the people was that in which the votes were collected by centuries, or classes. A attendant, whose duty it was to mention the names of everybody that passed. Such people were particularly employed by persons engaged in a public canvass. The gates of Rome.

drew up another, giving him an unlimited command of money, superadding a fleet and army, and a greater authority in the provinces, than was possessed by the governors themselves. That consular law of mine now appears quite modest; this of Messius intolerable. Pompeius says he prefers the former; his friends are for the latter. The consular senators, headed by Favonius, exclaimed against it; I say nothing; more especially because the pontifices have yet given no opinion respecting my house<sup>1</sup>. If they remove the religious impediments, I shall have a noble area, and, agreeably to the resolution of the senate, the consuls will estimate the value of the buildings: if it is otherwise, they will pull down what is now there, will contract for a house in their own names, and will make an estimate of the whole amount. Such is the situation of my affairs; hazardous for a state of prosperity; for a state of adversity, good. In my income, as you know, I am much embarrassed; and have besides some domestic troubles, which I do not care to commit to writing. I have all that affection, which I ought to have, towards my brother Quintus, endowed as he is with distinguished loyalty, virtue, and fidelity. I am looking for you, and beg you to hasten your coming; and to come in such a disposition of mind, as not to suffer me to remain in want of your counsel. I am entering upon the beginning of another life. Already some, who defended me in my absence, begin to be secretly angry with me upon my return, and openly to envy me. I greatly want you.

LETTER II.

If it happens that you hear from me less frequently than from some others, I beg you will not attribute it to my neglect, nor even to my occupations; which, great as they are, yet can never interrupt the course of my affection and duty. But since I came to Rome, it is now only the second time that I have known of any body to whom I could entrust a letter; consequently this is the second I have sent. In the former I described to you the manner of my return, and what was my situation, and the condition of all my affairs, hazardous for a state of prosperity, for a state of adversity good enough. After the date of that letter, there followed a great contest about my house. I spoke before the pontifices the last day of September. The cause was diligently debated by me, so that if ever I made a figure in speaking, or if ever else, then at least the sense of my injuries, and the importance of the issue, added new force to my language. I could not, therefore, withhold the speech from our young friends; and, though you do not ask for it, yet I shall shortly send it to you. The sentence of the pontifices was to this effect—"If he who said he had made a dedication had not been specially appointed to that purpose by any order of the people, either in their centuries or tribes; then that part of the area appeared capable of being restored to me without any religious impediment. Upon this I was immediately congratulated<sup>1</sup> for nobody doubted but the house was adjudged to me. But presently that fellow<sup>2</sup> mounts the rostra, by permission of Appius<sup>3</sup>, and tells the people that the pontifices had given sentence in his favour, but that I was attempting to get possession by force; and he exhorts them to support him and Appius, and to defend their own liberties. Upon this, while even among that lowest rabble some wondered, some smiled at the fellow's madness, I had determined not to come forward till the consuls, by the decree of the senate, should first have contracted for the rebuilding of Catulus's portico<sup>4</sup>. On the first of October was held a full senate, at which all those pontifices, who were senators, were present. Marcellinus, who was much attached to me, being first called upon to speak, inquired of them what they had intended by their sentence. Upon which M. Lucullus, in the name of all his colleagues, replied, that the pontifices were the judges of religion, the senate of the law: that he and his colleagues had given their opinion upon the point of religion; that they would speak of the law in the senate. Each of them then being asked his opinion in turn, argued at length in my favour. When it came to Clodius to speak, he wished to wear out the day<sup>5</sup>; nor was there any end to it, till after having spoken for nearly three hours, he was at length compelled, by the disapprobation and clamour of the senate, to bring his discourse to a conclusion. A decree of the senate being then made agreeably to the proposal of Marcellinus, with only one dissentient voice, Serranus interceded<sup>6</sup>. Immediately both consuls referred it to the senate to take this intercession into consideration; and the most dignified opinions were pronounced, that it was the pleasure of the senate that my house should be restored to me; that Catulus's portico should be rebuilt; that the resolution of the senate<sup>7</sup> should be supported by all the magistrates; that if any violence was offered, the senate would consider it to have been done by his means who had interposed his negative. Serranus took fright, and Cornicinus had recourse to his old farce; and having cast off his upper garment, he threw himself at the feet of his son-in-law<sup>8</sup>. He asked to have the night to consider of it, which they were not disposed to grant, for they had not forgotten the first of January<sup>9</sup>. With some difficulty, however, this was acceded to by my consent. The next day the decree of the senate was made, which I sent you. Then the consuls contracted for the restoring of Catulus's portico. What Clodius had done was immediately demolished by the contractors, with universal approbation. The consuls, by the opinion of their council<sup>10</sup>, valued what had been erected upon the ground at 2000 sestertia (16,000*l.*)<sup>11</sup>; the other things very illiberally. My Tusculanum at 500 sestertia (4000*l.*). The Formianum at 250 sestertia (2000*l.*). This valuation was very much censured, not only by all the best people, but even by the common sort. You will naturally ask, then, what was the cause of it. They say it was my modesty, in neither objecting, nor strenuously urging my claims. But that is not the case, for this might indeed have been of advantage to me; but these same people, my Titus Pomponius, I say these very people, whom you know well enough, who have clipped my wings, are unwilling to let them grow again; but I hope they are already growing. Do you only come to me, which I am afraid of your not doing till late, owing to the arrival of your and my friend Varro. Having put you in possession of what has been done, let me inform you of my further designs. I have engaged myself to Pompeius in such a manner, as in no degree to be prevented from being at liberty, if I should wish it, either to offer myself for the censorship, should the next consuls hold the comitia for that purpose, or to take a votive legation<sup>12</sup> of almost all the shrines and groves; for so my affairs required<sup>13</sup>. And I wished to have it in my power either to canvass, or at the beginning of the summer to go from Rome: and in the mean time I thought it desirable to keep in the sight of the citizens who had shown me such great kindness. These are my views with regard to the public, but my domestic concerns are greatly embroiled. The building of my house at Rome is going on. You know with what expense, and what trouble, I am restoring my Formianum, which I am neither able to relinquish, nor to sell. My Tusculanum I have advertised for sale. I cannot easily do without a villa near the city. The kindness of my friends has been exhausted in that business, which has produced nothing but disgrace; which you felt at a distance, I in fact<sup>14</sup>. By their favour and assistance I should easily have obtained everything, if my own defenders had permitted it. But I have now great trouble from this source. The other things which vex me are of a more secret nature<sup>15</sup>. I enjoy the affection of my brother and of my daughter. I am expecting you.

<sup>1</sup> Clodius, when he destroyed Cicero's house in Rome, consecrated part of the area on which it stood, and erected a temple there to the goddess Liberty. The remaining part Clodius had planted, and appropriated to his own use. Hence it is that Cicero goes on to say, if the consecration of the area be set aside, he shall have a noble space for a new house; or if it should not be set aside, that the consuls were at least to clear the ground, and contract for the building of a house for him on the unconsecrated part.

<sup>8</sup> It was on the first of January, upon occasion of the debate on Cicero's recall, that Serranus and Cornicinus had done the same thing before; but at that time Serranus persisted in his opposition.

<sup>9</sup> It appears that the magistrates were accustomed to have the opinion of a council in conducting business of importance that was entrusted to them.

<sup>11</sup> The senators not being permitted by law to absent themselves from Rome without leave, used the subterfuge of an honorary lieutenantancy, or expiation of a vow, to set themselves at liberty. See book ii., letter 18.

<sup>12</sup> The disorder into which his affairs had been thrown in different parts of Italy, made it, I suppose, either a real, or a pretended reason, for having these votive legations in so many places.

know you will be glad to be informed of what is going on here, and in what concerns me, to hear it myself; not that such matters, which are done in the face of the world, can be more certain from me, than from anybody else who may write to or tell you about them; but that you may know from my style how I am affected by them, what is the present feeling of my mind, and condition of my life. On the third of November, workmen were violently driven from my house by armed men; the portico of Catulus, which was rebuilding by contract entered into by the consuls, agreeably to the decree of the senate, which had already reached the roof, was thrown down.

My brother Quintus's house was first injured, then thrown from my area, then set on fire by Clodius, in sight of the whole city, with inflammable materials, to the great grief and lamentation, I say not of all good people, for I know not who are any, but fairly of all people. He rushed furiously; and, after this outrage, seemed to do nothing but the slaughter of his enemies; issued from street to street, and openly invited slaves to revolt. Before, when he avoided a case he had indeed a difficult case, and strong force against him; but yet he had a case, he denied the fact, he might lay it upon others, but even defend some of the charges as war-buys by law. After this ruin, fire, plunder, he is aided by his friends, and scarcely retains Decimus as marshal, or Gellius: he uses the counsel of the senate; he sees that if he should kill all whom he has in his cause upon trial could not be worse is already. Therefore as I was going down red Street on the 3d of November, he pursued me with his mob; shouts, stones, sticks, all unforeseen. I retreated into the vestibule of Tertius Damion; they who were with me prevented these rioters from entering. He himself has been killed. But I begin to get weary; I am tired of manual operations. I saw that he was driven by the general law to trial, but to punishment, he afterwards killed all the Catilines and Acidini. For on the 14th of November he was so determined to destroy Milo's house on Mount Germalus, that at eleven o'clock in the morning he brought his shields and drawn swords, and others armed with torches. He had taken possession of the house of P. Sulla as his camp, to conduct the attack at that time Q. Flaccus brought out from the nether house some determined men, killed the most notorious of the Clodian mob, and then killed him, but he took refuge in the inner part of the building. On the 14th Sulla came to the house, Clodius staid at home, Marcellinus was present, everybody was exasperated. Metellus the slaves of the ancient Romans were all slaves, of which I kept a prodigious number.

On this occasion he had been accused by Milo for the crime committed while he was tribune. The consuls were driven to prevent the prosecution.

It is thought to be written "Dieta curare incipio." The sense is, that "I begin to have my affairs managed by gentle methods." In the other case it would be "I begin to treat Clodius by gentle methods."

The opulent citizens had more than one house frequently by adoption or bequest.

wasted the time of speaking by cavilling, in which he was assisted by Oppius<sup>d</sup>, and even by your friend<sup>e</sup>, of whose firmness and excellence your letters have spoken so truly<sup>f</sup>. Sestius was outrageous; Clodius, if his election<sup>g</sup> were not suffered to take place, threatened the city. Upon the proposal of Marcellinus's motion, which he delivered from a written paper, so as to include the whole of my case, the area, the burning, my personal danger, and made them all to precede the comitia<sup>h</sup>; one declared<sup>i</sup> that he would observe the heavens<sup>j</sup> on all the comitia days. Then followed factious speeches from Metellus, rash ones from Appius, furious ones from Publius. This, however, is the sum; unless Milo had declared his observation of the heavens in the Campus Martius, the comitia would have taken place. On the 20th of November Milo came into the Campus Martius in the middle of the night with a great attendance. Clodius, though he had a chosen band of runaway slaves, dared not come into the field. Milo remained till noon with great honour, and to the great joy of the people. The struggle of the three brothers<sup>k</sup> was disgraceful, their strength broken, their fury contemptible. Metellus challenges a prohibition in the forum the next day; that there was no occasion to come into the Campus Martius by night; that he should be in the forum at seven <sup>d</sup> Manutius has not without reason conjectured that it ought to be written Appius, who was Clodius's brother, and was prætor, and was in the senate.

<sup>i</sup> Proscriptum. It has been doubted what was the nominative to this verb. I believe it to be used indefinitely, and without a nominative. That this is sometimes done by ancient authors, has been observed by Bentley on the construction of the word "inquit," Hor. l. Seren. iv. 78. Bishop Pearce has extended this observation to some other words in his note upon 1 Cor. vi. 16. Many other examples of the same kind might be produced both in sacred and profane writings. Of the former I would instance the word ἀποκαλύπτεται, 1 Cor. xiii. 13, which has given some trouble to commentators, and among the rest to Pearce himself. I apprehend it to be used absolutely or indefinitely, and without any nominative—"it is revealed," or "revelation is made." It is used in the same manner again, c. xiv. 30. So 2 Cor. xiii. 16, ἥτις καὶ ὁ ἀν ἐπιστρέψῃ—"whenever any one turn." 1 Cor. xiv. 5 and 13, διεμνηστεύῃ—"one interpret," or "it be interpreted." So Luke xvi. 9, δέξεται ὑμᾶς—"that you may be received." Among profane authors we find the same construction, as ἐνδέχεται, Arr. Epict. l. 22, "Does any one admit?" τὸν ὅσον δόξονται προσδεξίαν κακοῦ, Aristot. Eth. iii. 6, "People define." And in Latin, Ordinis hæc virtus erit et venus, aut ego fallor, Ut jam nunc dicat, &c.—"that one should say." Hor. Ars Poet. 42. So again, v. 252, Trimeteris accrescere jussit nomen Iambeis—"it was ordained." And similar to these is "putant," Cic. Nat. Deor. li. 16—"it is supposed."

<sup>j</sup> The magistrates only were allowed to observe the heavens for the purpose of divination; and when they did so, no comitia could be held.

in the morning. Therefore, on the 21st Milo came before sun-rise into the forum. Metellus at the first dawn was hastening secretly to the Campus Martius through by-ways; Milo comes up to him between the groves<sup>1</sup>; forbids the comitia: he withdrew under the severe and opprobrious scoffs of Q. Flaccus. The 22d was market day<sup>2</sup>. On that day, and the day following, there was no meeting. It is on the 24th that I am writing, at three o'clock in the morning: Milo is already in possession of the Campus Martius. Marcellus the candidate<sup>3</sup> is snoring, so that I, who am his neighbour, might hear him. Clodius's vestibule, I am told, is deserted, there being but a few ragged fellows, without even a lantern. Their party complained that it was all my doing, little knowing the spirit and the ability of that hero<sup>4</sup>. His courage is admirable. I send you rare news. But this is the sum of the whole: I do not think the comitia will be held, and I do think that Publius, if he is not first killed, will be brought to trial by Milo. If he come in his way, I foresee that he will be killed by Milo; he does not hesitate to do it; he openly professes it; my fate<sup>5</sup> does not intimidate him, for he has had no envious and faithless counsellor, nor does he mean to trust to any inactive great man. My mind alone is in full vigour, even more so than when I was in power; in my property I am wasted; yet I contrive to repay the liberality of my brother Quintus against his will, from the resources of my friends rather than my own, lest I should be quite exhausted. In your absence I am at a loss what measures to take respecting the general state of my affairs; therefore hasten up.

LETTER IV.

On the 30th of January, before it was light, Cincius made himself most agreeable to me by informing me that you were in Italy, and that he was going to send a servant to you, whom I would not suffer to go without a letter from me; not that I have anything particular to tell you, especially being now so near; but that I might assure you that your arrival is most grateful to me, and what I have been most anxiously expecting. Therefore, fly up, in order to gratify your own affection, and to feel the effects of mine. We will settle other matters when we meet. I write this in haste. As soon as you arrive, come with your attendants to my house; I shall be delighted to receive you. You will find a noble arrangement of Tyrannio for the library of my books, the remains of which are much better than I had supposed. I should be glad also if you would send me two of your library clerks, whom Tyrannio may employ in repairing my books, and other offices, and that you would direct them to bring some parchment to make indexes, which I think you Greeks call syllabuses. But this according to your convenience. But do you at all events come, if you can stay in this part of the country<sup>6</sup>, and can bring Pilia<sup>7</sup>, for this is reasonable, and Tullia wishes it. In good truth you have bought a splendid situation. I understand your gladiators fight admirably. If you had chosen to contract for them, you might have saved yourself these two charges<sup>8</sup>. But of these things hereafter. Only mind to come; and, if you have any regard for me, remember about the librarians.

LETTER V.

WHAT say you? Do you suppose that I should wish my compositions to be read and approved by anybody, rather than by you? Why then have I sent them first to anybody else? I was pressed by him<sup>9</sup> to whom I sent them, and had no other copy. What? Besides (for I have some time been nibbling at what must be swallowed at last) a recantation of my sentiments seemed to be rather disreputable. But farewell to upright, and true, and honourable counsels! It is not to be believed what perfidy there is in those chiefs<sup>10</sup>, as they wish to be; and as they would be, if they had any honesty. I have understood and known them, having been invited, deserted, cast off by them; yet it had been my intention to co-operate with them in the republic. They are the same that they were: I have at length by your instruction grown wiser. You will say that you advised, and persuaded me what to do; but not to write also. But I chose to lay myself under an obligation to maintain this new connexion; and to prevent my relapsing to those, who, when they ought to pity, do not cease to envy me. However I have, as I wrote you word, been very temperate in my subject. I shall become more exuberant, if both he receives it kindly, and these people show their vexation; who ill endure that I should possess a villa which had belonged to Catulus, and do not consider that I bought it of Vettius<sup>11</sup>; who say that it did not become me to build a house; that I ought rather to sell one. But what more? If in the public expression of my sentiments I have spoken anything which they might approve; yet their joy is, that I should have spoken contrary to the wish of Pompeius. But there is now an end of this; and since those, who have no power, do not choose to behave kindly to me, let me try to be kindly received by those who have. You will say, "I wished it long ago." I know that you wished it; and that I was a very <sup>11</sup> Purchasing gladiators, and purchasing a place for them to exhibit: so I understand this passage, which is not very clear. These gladiators are supposed to have been in honour of Cæcilius. See book iii. letter 20.

<sup>12</sup> This seems to have been Caesar, to whom Cicero had sent a complimentary poem.

<sup>13</sup> He probably means those who, while they professed to support the republic, were actuated by jealousy towards Cicero, as he frequently insinuates in other letters.

<sup>14</sup> There were several of this name, all of them people of obscurity, and thereby forming a contrast to the family of Catulus.

but it is now time that I should have regard of people. I am much obliged to you for frequent visits to my house. Crassipes the road into the grounds; this seems more decent. You will return home the next day, does it signify to you? But I will see to it. Your people have highly decorated my by their arrangement and coverings. I am glad if you would commend them for it.

LETTER VI.

 consolation, though a poor one, that I by lament his fate like Sauspeus, and the rest they consider him to have been snatched from by some favour of the gods. For

 As for you, though you have all the to party, but feel a common interest in it, if I speak of the republic as I ought, thing, oppressed and fettered. What then have I for grief? which is also this circumstance, that I cannot even fear of appearing ungrateful. What tire, and shelter myself in some port is in vain. Rather let me rush into the field. Shall I then submit to who have refused to be a leader? So or so I see it pleases you, whom I always minded. What remains is (according to proverb) "Sparta is your lot, make it." In good truth I cannot; and I conduct of Philoxenus, who chose to be conducted back to prison<sup>2</sup>. But I place to discard these sentiments<sup>3</sup>;

 we meet, shall confirm my purpose.
 you sent me several letters, which I the same time; and this even added which you advise me to write; I am engaged in injunction. But in truth at the very outset I relinquished it, that I might not appear foolishly to have been offended with the unkindness of a friend; then again foolishly to proclaim it by writing. I was at the same time apprehensive lest the depth of my abasement, which has appeared in my actions, might become still more conspicuous if I should write anything; and that offering satisfaction might seem to partake of levity, but I will consider of it. Do you only let me hear something from you as often as possible. Desire Luccius to show you the letter which I have just sent him, in which I ask him to write the account of my transactions;

 I hope you will be pleased with it<sup>5</sup>. Encourage him to set about the work; and thank him for havas far as you can. Say something proper to Vestorius, who is very liberal towards me.

LETTER VII.

NOTHING could be more seasonable than your letter, which relieved my mind from great uneasiness, on account of our dear boy Quintus<sup>7</sup>. Char-rippus had come hither two hours before, and had quite frightened me. As to what you say of Apol-lonius; what evil spirit has possessed him, a fellow from Greece, to suppose he might throw his affairs into disorder, like the Roman knights? for Terentius might plead his right<sup>8</sup>. With respect to Metellus, peace to the dead; but, however, for many years there has not died a citizen, who ——. I will be answerable for your money. For what need you fear, whomsoever he has made his heir? unless it is Publius. But he has not done improperly, although he was himself ——. Therefore, on his account, you will not have occasion to open your coffers. In what concerns the others<sup>9</sup>, you must be more cautious. You will have the goodness to attend to my requests about my house<sup>1</sup>; you will set a guard; you will warn Milo. The people of Arpinum are clamorous on the subject of Laterium<sup>1</sup>?
 What say you? I for my part am sorry. But (as Atticus may have had some money dealings with him, and with Apollonius, and that they were both defaulters.

<sup>9</sup> These breaks are evidently indicative of some reproachful expressions, of which Cicero checked the utterance out of respect to the dead.

 to look after it. Indeed it seems to have been necessary, not only for the sake of encouraging and directing the workmen, but also to protect it from the violence of Clo-dius. See letter 3 of this book.

 bourhood of Arpinum. By some alterations he seems to have given offence to the people there.

LETTER VIII.

MANY passages in your letter delighted me, and nothing more than your "dish of potted cheese<sup>k</sup>." As to what you say about my debts being reduced "to a shred," I reply by the proverb, "call nobody great before you see his end<sup>l</sup>." I find nothing for you ready built in the country; there is something in the town<sup>m</sup>; but it is uncertain whether it is to be sold. This is close to my house. Be assured that Antium is the Bathrotum of Rome, as that of yours is of Coreyra. Nothing can be quieter, nothing more retired, nothing pleasanter. "However despicable, our home is still dear<sup>n</sup>." But since Tyrannio has arranged my books, a new spirit seems to animate my house; and in accomplishing this, Dionysius and your Menophilus have been of wonderful assistance. Nothing can be more elegant than your shelves, now that the books are so highly distinguished by their covers. I should be glad to hear from you of the success of the gladiators<sup>p</sup>; but it is on the presumption that they conducted themselves well; if otherwise, I do not ask about them<sup>q</sup>.

Apenas was scarcely gone, when your letter arrived. What say you? Do you think he will not propose<sup>r</sup> the law? Speak louder, I beseech you; for I seem scarcely to have heard it. But let me know presently, if it is not troublesome to you. As a day has been added to the holidays, I can the better spend that day here with Dionysius. I am quite of your mind about Trebonius. With respect to Domitius<sup>s</sup>, "no fig, I swear, was ever so like another," as his situation is to mine; either because it happens through the same people, or because it is beyond all expectation, or because there are no honest men left. In one respect it is unlike; that he deserves it. But with respect to the misfortune itself, I do not know if mine were not the lesser; for what can be worse than this, that he who has been all his life looked upon as consul elect<sup>t</sup>, should at last be unable to obtain the <sup>k</sup> Several parts of this letter refer to some expressions previously addressed to Cicero by Atticus. Cicero having been living in retirement, seems to have given occasion to Atticus to banter him on his spare living, from which he concludes that he must have reduced his debts to a mere trifle. The word tyrolarichum is met with again, book xiv. letter 16. Raudusculum occurs, book vi. letter 8, book vii. letter 2, and book xiv. letter 14.

<sup>q</sup> This seems to have been the conclusion of a letter despatched by a slave of the name of Apenas. The rest should be considered either as a separate letter, or a post-script written after recalling his messenger.

But if it be, which I do not pretend to know, that he has in the memorandums of his calendar as long a list of consuls to come, as of those already made, what can be more wretched than he? unless it be the republic, in which there is no hope even of any amendment. The first intelligence I had of Natta was from your letter. I dislike the man. You ask about my poem. What if it should endeavour to make its escape? Would you consent? With regard to Fabius Luscus, which I had been going to mention, he was always very friendly to me, nor had I ever borne him any ill will; for he was a sensible, modest, well behaved man. As I did not happen to see him, I supposed he had been absent; till I heard from this Gavius Firmum, that he was in Rome, and had been there all along. Can such a trifling cause, you will say, have offended him? He had given me much information about the Firmian brothers. What may be the reason of his anger against me, if he is angry, I am quite ignorant. Respecting the advice you give me, to conduct myself like a good politician, and keep my own counsel; I shall do so. But I stand in need of greater prudence; for which I shall apply to you, as I use to do. I wish, if you have any access to Fabius, that you would smell out, and just taste that guest of yours<sup>u</sup>; and send me daily accounts of these, and all other matters. When you have nothing to tell me, tell me even that. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

(Græc. x.)

It is strongly reported at Puteoli that Ptolemæus is restored to his kingdom<sup>v</sup>. If you have any certain information, I should be glad to know it. I am here feeding on Faustus's library. You might suppose perhaps that it was on the exquisite productions of Puteoli and Lucrinum. There is no want of these; but, to say the truth, in the present state of the republic, I have lost my relish for other enjoyments and pleasures; and find support and refreshment from books alone: and would rather occupy that little seat of yours under the statue of Aristotle<sup>w</sup>, than the carule chair of these people; and rather walk with you at your house, than with him<sup>x</sup>, with whom I see I must walk. But about this walk chance must determine, unless there be some god who has a regard to us. With respect to my gallery, and my stove, and all that Cyrus<sup>y</sup> is engaged to do, I should be glad if, as far as you can, you would look after them; and press Philotimus to despatch; that I may have it in my power to make you some return in this kind<sup>z</sup>. Pompeius came to Cumanum the 23rd of

I wish you to inform me what you are doing yourself. For, to say the truth, I am not so much delighted with the news, as with your letters. I have brought nobody with me besides Dionysius: yet I am not afraid of being without your conversation. I am charmed with the work<sup>f</sup>. You will give my book to Lucceius. I send you that of Demetrius Magnes, that you may have a person ready to bring me back a letter from you.

LETTER XII.

EGNATIUS<sup>g</sup> is at Rome. But I spoke to him strongly upon Halimetus's business at Antium, and he promised to exert his influence with Aquilius. You will be able to see him therefore if you wish it. I scarcely think I can offer my assistance to Macro; for on the 15th I see there is to be an auction at Larinum, which will last three days. I hope, therefore, though you interest yourself so much about him, that you will excuse me. But, as you love me, come with Pilia to dine<sup>h</sup> at my house the 2d of next month: in short you must do it. On the 1st I mean to dine in the gardens of Crassipes, by way of an inn. I shall elude the order of the senate<sup>i</sup> and shall get home after dinner, that I may be ready the next morning for Milo. I shall there see you, and remind you of your engagement. All my family join in kind regards.

LETTER XIII.

I SEE that you are apprised of my having come to Tusculanum the 15th of November; there I met Dionysius. We wish to be at Rome the 15th of next month. What do I say? we wish? nay, but we must be there. Milo's marriage is to be celebrated; and there is some expectation of the comitia being held<sup>j</sup>. If this is confirmed, I am not sorry to have been absent during the altercations, which I understand have taken place in the senate<sup>k</sup>. For I must either have supported what I could not approve; or must have been wanting in attention, where I ought not. But I hope you will describe to me, as distinctly as possible, these matters, and the present state of the republic, and how the consuls<sup>l</sup> bear this rude treatment.

Apuleius was the name of a seditious tribune in Marius's time, who had driven into banishment Metellus Numidicus. The feminine termination is added in contempt, to mark his effeminacy and degeneracy.

<sup>h</sup> The Latin cena, which is usually translated supper, nearly corresponds to our dinner: it was commonly served about three or four o'clock in the afternoon. The prandium of the Romans resembled our luncheon.

I am quite thirsty for news : and if you ask me, I must say that I have sad misgivings. They say that our Crassus went out in his military dress not quite with the same dignity as his coeval formerly L. Paullus, then a second time consul. O the wicked man!<sup>1</sup> I have finished the oratorical books with care : they have occupied much of my time and attention : you may get them transcribed. I have also to beg this of you, that you will make me an accurate representation of the present state of things, that I may not come thither quite a stranger.

LETTER XIV.

OUR friend Vestorius has informed me by letter, that he believes you left Rome on the 10th of May, later than he had mentioned, because you had not been quite well. I shall be very glad to hear that you are better. I wish you would write home to your people to let me have access to your books, in the same manner as if you were there. Amongst others, I particularly want Varro's works<sup>2</sup>. For I must take some things from thence for the books which I have in hand, and which I hope you will approve. I should be glad, if you have any news, especially from my brother Quintus<sup>3</sup>, next from C. Cæsar, and if you can tell me anything of the comitia, or the republic, (for you commonly soon smell out these matters,) that you would let me know. If you have nothing to tell me, yet let me hear from you ; for your letters can never be unseasonable, or unwelcome. But, above all, I beg you to come back to us as soon as you have finished your business, and completed your journey<sup>4</sup> to your mind. Make my compliments to Dionysius. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

(Græv. xvi.)

You may judge how busy I am, by receiving this letter<sup>5</sup> in the hand-writing of a clerk. On the frequency of your letters I have nothing to accuse you : but most of them only let me know where you were, as coming from you ; or, besides, informed me that you were well. I was particularly glad to receive two letters of this kind almost at the same time, which you sent from Buthrotum ; for I was anxious to know that you had had a good passage. But this frequent correspondence rather pleased me by its quickness than by its copiousness. The letter which your guest M. Paccius delivered to me was indeed important, and full of matter. To this, therefore, I shall write in answer ; and, in the first place, must tell you that I have shown Paccius, by words and deeds, the weight of your recommendation : so that though he was before quite a stranger to me, I have received him into close familiarity. I shall now proceed to the other parts of your letter. Varro, about whom you write to me, shall be introduced in some place<sup>6</sup>, if only a place can be found for him. But you are aware of the nature of my dialogues ; so that in those upon oratory, which you so highly commend, no mention could be made of anybody, who was not known, or heard of, by those who carry on the disputation. This, which I have begun on the subject of government, I have attributed to the persons of Africanus, and Philus, and Lælius, and Manilius : and have added the young men Q. Tubero, P. Rutilius, and Lælius's two sons-in-law Scævola and Fannius. I thought, therefore, since I mean to prefix an introduction to each book, as Aristotle has done in those which he calls his public treatises, of making some occasion for naming him ; which I understand you approve. I only wish I may be able to accomplish my undertaking ; for I have embraced, as you perceive, a great and momentous subject, and one which demands much leisure, which I exceedingly want. When in those books which you commend, you miss the person of Scævola, you must know that I have withdrawn it not inadvertently ; but have followed the example of our divine Plato in his Republic. There, when Socrates had come into the Piræus to Cephalus, a rich and pleasant old man, as long as the first dialogue was going on, the old man is present at the disputation ; then, having himself delivered his opinion, he says that he must go away upon some religious business ; and he does not afterwards return. I imagine Plato thought it hardly proper to detain a person of that age any longer in so protracted a discussion. Much more I thought it right to use the same discretion in regard to Scævola, whose age and state of health you remember, as well as his honours ; which made it hardly becoming in him to remain for several days in Crassus's Tusculan villa. Besides, the subject of the first book was congenial with Scævola's studies ; the others, as you know, contain technical reasonings, at which I did not choose to have that cheerful old man, such as you knew him, to be present. I shall pay attention to what you tell me concerning my daughter's settlement ; for by the testimony, as you say, of Aurelius, it is a good security : and by this also I shall recommend myself to my dear Tullia. I am not wanting to Vestorius : for I understand this to be your wish ; and I take care to let him know it. But are you aware of his disposition, that while we are both ready to serve him, nothing can be more untractable ? Now for what you ask about C. Cato. You know that he was acquitted on the Junian and Licinian law ; and I foretell that he will be acquitted on the Fufian ; and that, with even more satisfaction to his accusers than to his supporters. He has, however, returned into friendship with me and Milo. Drusus is prosecuted by Licinius, with leave to challenge the judges on the 3rd of July. The rumours about Proculus are not favourable ; but you know how the judgments are given.

<sup>2</sup> Varro had written several treatises on the history and antiquities of Rome, with which he was particularly conversant. Cicero was probably engaged in his work on Government.

found not guilty. It is thought the three candi- dates will be accused; Domitius by Memmius, Messala by Q. Pompeius Rufus, Scaurus by Triarius or by L. Cæsar. "What," you will ask, "will you be able to say for them?" May I die, if I know. In those three books, which you commend, I find nothing. Now, to give you my opinion of affairs, we must bear them. Do you ask how I conducted myself? with firmness and freedom. "But he," you will say, "how did he bear it?" Patiently; conceiving that he was bound to have some consideration for my dignity, till satisfaction should be made to me. How, then, was he acquitted? Through the incredible weakness of his accusers, that is, of L. Lentulus the younger, whom everybody cries out upon as guilty of prevarication; then, through the extraordinary exertions of Pompeius, and the corruption of the judges. Yet, after all, thirty-two found him guilty, thirty-eight acquitted him. The other trials are still hanging over him: so that he is not fairly clear of his difficulties. You will say, "How, then, do you bear all this?" In truth, very well; and I am very well satisfied with myself for doing so. We have lost, my Pomponius, not only all the life and spirit, but the very complexion and ancient form of the state. There is no longer any republic, in which I can take pleasure, or acquiesce with any satisfaction. "Is this then," you will say, "what you bear so easily?" Even so: for I remember how flourishing the state was not long since, when I was at the head of affairs; and what return I have met with: so that I am troubled with no anxiety on that account. They, who were mortified at my having any share of power, are now outrageous that one man should possess all power. Many circumstances afford me comfort: yet I do not descend from my state; but return to that course of life which is most congenial to my nature, literature and study. The toil of pleading I relieve with the charms of oratory: my house and my country-seats afford me delight: I do not consider from whence I have fallen, but from whence I have risen. If I possess but my brother and you, the rest may go to ruin, for me. I may still philosophise with you. That part of my mind where passion once resided is grown callous: private and domestic concerns alone afford me pleasure. You will perceive a wonderful exemption from care, for which I principally depend upon your return: for there is nobody on earth whose sentiments are so congenial with my own. But hear something more: things tend to an interregnum; and there is some surmise of a dictator. Indeed there is much talk of it: which was of some use to Gabinus before timid judges. The consular candidates are all charged with bribery. Gabinus, too, is added to the number;

whom P. Sylla accused, not doubting but that he was out of the city; while Torquatus opposed it without any effect. But they will all be acquitted; nor will anybody hereafter be condemned, unless he be guilty of murder. But all this is prosecuted with severity, so that the witnesses become eager. M. Fulvius Nobilior has been found guilty: many others, shrewd people do not even wait to answer to their accusation. What more? news? yet there is some. Upon the acquittal of Gabinius, other judges, in indignation, an hour after, condemned by the Papian law one Antiochus Gabinius from among the assistants of the painter Sopolis, a freed-man, and serjeant of Gabinius. This man, therefore, charged by the Papian law with offence against the state, immediately said in Greek, "Have I not known thee, Mars, along with Paphias?" Pontinius wants to enter in triumph the 2nd of November. Cato and Servilius the prætors, and Q. Mucius the tribune, openly oppose it; for they say that no law has been passed for his command<sup>1</sup>; and, in truth, it was passed in a foolish manner. But Pontinius will have the consul Appius with him. Cato, however, affirms that, as long as he lives, he shall not have a triumph. I imagine this, like many other things of the same kind, will come to nothing. Appius thinks of going into Cilicia at his own expense, without waiting for the law. I have replied to the letter I received by Paccius: let me inform you of the rest. I have learned from my brother's letters more than I could have believed respecting Cæsar's affection for me; and it is abundantly confirmed by Cæsar's own letters. The event of the Britanic war is anxiously expected; for it appears that the access to the island is defended by prodigious bulwarks; and it is now known there is not a grain of silver in the island, nor any hope of plunder, unless of slaves; of whom I imagine you do not expect to find any skilled in letters or in music. Paulus has now nearly built the court-house in the middle of the forum with the same ancient pillars; but that which he has begun is very magnificent. What say you? Nothing can be more acceptable, nothing more glorious, than that monument. Likewise the friends of Cæsar (myself I mean and Oppius, though you should burst with envy) towards that public work, which you used to praise to the skies, of enlarging the forum, and opening it quite to the Hall of Liberty, have disregarded the sum of 60,000 sesteria (500,000*l.*); as the claims of individuals could not be settled for less. We shall accomplish a most noble work. For in the Campus Martius we are going to make marble inclosures covered in for the comitia of the tribes; and we shall surround them with a lofty portico a mile in circuit. To this work will also be added a public hall. You will say, "What good will this do me?" What? should I conceal from you these Roman concerns? For when you ask what is doing at Rome, I cannot suppose you ask about the census, which is now past all hope; or about the judgments that may be given by the Coctian<sup>1</sup> law. Now suffer me to scold you, if I have reason on my side. For you say in the letter, which C. Decimus delivered to me, dated from Buthrotum, that you thought it would be necessary for you to go into Asia. To me, indeed, it seemed to signify nothing, whether you transacted your business by your agents or in person; since you so often go away, and stay away so long<sup>2</sup>. But I would rather have considered this with you, while it was yet open to discussion; for then I might have done something: as it is, I shall check the reproof I was going to give you. I wish it may have any effect in hastening your return. I write to you less frequently, because I am uncertain where you are, or where you are likely to be. I have thought fit, however, to give this letter to one who, it was probable, would see you. Since you think that you shall go into Asia, I should be glad to know at what time I may expect you here, and what you have done about Eutychides<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> It is not known whence the Greek is taken. It probably alludes to the fable of Mars being caught with the Paphian Venus by her husband Vulcan; then it will mean that Gabinius was as guilty, as this his freed-man, under the same Papian law.

<sup>3</sup> Before one entered Rome in triumph, it was necessary to pass a law permitting him to assume a military command for that day.

LETTER XVI.

(Græc. xv.)

I AM much pleased with what you have done about Eutychides<sup>1</sup>, who will have your old name of Titus with your new one of Cæcilius: as Dionysius's name is compounded of yours and mine into Marcus Pomponius. I shall be particularly glad if Eutychides understands that this has been done out of your attention to my wishes; and that his kindness towards me in my distress was not lost upon me at the time, and has not been forgotten since. I conclude it was necessary to undertake your Asiatic journey. For without sufficient cause you never would have gone so far from your friends and all that you hold dear. But your kindness of heart and affection will best be shown by your speedy return. I have some fear however lest you should be detained by the urbanity of the rhetorician Clodius, and by Pitunianus; who, they say, is a man of great learning, and now addicted to Greek literature. But, if you would be esteemed a man of probity, come back to us at the time you appointed. You shall be at liberty to enjoy the society of these persons at Rome, when they are safely arrived. You say that you are wishing to hear from me. I have written to you, and upon various subjects, all detailed in a journal<sup>2</sup>. But I suppose, as you do not seem to have remained long in Epirus, my letter never reached you. But the kind of letters I send you is such.

<sup>2</sup> I conceive Cicero to mean that Atticus so often absented himself, that it was of little moment to him whether he went in person to Asia, or whether he remained at Buthrotum.

<sup>4</sup> Eutychides seems to have been a slave, to whom Atticus had given his freedom at the instance of Cicero; and, as was usual on such occasions, had given him his own name in addition to what he bore before.

citizen! Memmius is supported by the whole weight of Cæsar's influence; with him the consuls have joined Domitius, under what conditions I dare not commit to a letter. Pompeius storms, and complains, and favours Scaurus; but whether he does this in appearance, or in earnest, is matter of doubt. There is no eminence in any of the candidates; money levels all distinction. Messala is drooping; not that his courage or his friends fail him, but the junction of the consuls and Pompeius are against him. I expect these comitia will be put off. The candidates for the tribunate have sworn to petition under the arbitration of Cato. They have deposited with him 500 sester- tia (4000*l.*), on condition that whoever should by Cato be found guilty of bribery, should lose that sum, which is to be divided amongst his competi- tors. I write this the day before the comitia are expected to take place. But if they do take place, and the messenger is not gone, I will give you the whole history of them on the 28th of July. If, as it is believed, the elections should be carried with- out expense, Cato alone will have been able to do more than all the judges. I have been defending Messius, who is recalled from his lieutenantancy; for Appius had sent him out a lieutenant to Cæsar. Servilius ordered him to be present. He has the support of the tribes Pomptina, Velina, and Mæcia. There is a sharp contest; but considerable pro- gress is made. As soon as I am free from this, I am engaged for Drusus; then for Scaurus. Here are noble titles provided for my speeches. Per- haps I shall have also the consuls elect. If Scaurus is not one of them, he will have great difficulty in securing a favourable sentence. From my brother Quintus's letters I suspect he is now in Bri- tain. I am in some anxiety to know what he is doing. One thing I have gained; that I have re- peated and certain assurances of Cæsar's kindness and friendship. I should be glad if you would make my compliments to Dionysius, and ask and persuade him to come as soon as he can, to in- struct my young Cicero and myself too.

LETTER XVII.

WITH what pleasure did I receive your letter, which I had been looking for! O happy arrival! O well-observed promise, and rare fidelity! O charming voyage! How greatly was I alarmed when I recollected the coracles<sup>1</sup> of your former passage! But, if I am not mistaken, I shall see you sooner than you mention. For I imagine you thought that your ladies were in Apulia; which not being the case, why should Apulia detain you? for you must give up a few days to Vestorius, and taste again, after an interval, that Latin Atticism<sup>2</sup>.

what follows, it is probable that Atticus continued the same practice.

<sup>1</sup> Boats of wicker covered with leather, the Greek word of the text being probably equivalent to πλοία διφθέραια, or δερμύδρα, described by Cæsar, B. C. i. 54; and such as are still used in some places. I suspect this, like many of the Greek terms in these letters, may have been used by Atticus himself. It is meant to indicate the smallness of the vessel in which he had crossed the sea.

But then you fly up hither, and visit this genuine example of my republic*. I think I told you about the money openly distributed amongst the tribes from a certain place, previous to the comitia; also that Gabinus was acquitted: I take it for granted that he will be in authority. As to your inquiries about Messala, I do not know what to say. I never saw candidates so equal. With the strength of Messala you are well acquainted. Scaurus has been arraigned by Triarius. If you ask, I must say there is no great sympathy excited in his favour; yet his sedition has rendered his memory not unacceptable,—and the recollection of his father has weight with the country voters. The other two plebeians† are so matched, that Domitius is strongly supported by his friends, and derives some advantage from his public shows, which, however, were not very well received; Memmius is recommended by Cæsar's soldiers, and relies upon Pompeius's influence in the north of Italy. If he does not prevail with these helps, it is supposed that somebody will be found to put off the comitia till Cæsar's arrival; especially now that C. Cato has been acquitted‡. On the 24th of October I received letters from my brother Quintus and from Cæsar, dated from the shores of Britannia, the latest on the 26th of September,—at which time the war was finished and hostages had been received; there was no plunder, but a sum of money was imposed. They were going to transport the army back from Britannia. Q. Pilius had already set out to join Cæsar. Now if you have any regard for me and your connexions, or if you have any faith or prudence, and think of enjoying your own comforts, you ought to make haste and come to us. In truth I cannot patiently bear to be without you. What wonder that I should long for you, when I so much long for Dionysius? whom both I and my Cicero shall beg from you when the time comes. The last letter* I received from you was dated the 9th of August from Ephesus.

LETTER XVIII.

I SUPPOSE you think that I have forgot my custom and purpose, and that I write to you seldomer than I used to do; but the truth is, that seeing the uncertainty of your actual situation and of your movements, I have not directed letters to Epirus, nor to Athens, nor to Asia, nor intrusted them to anybody that was not going to you. For my letters are of such a kind that if they should not be delivered it might occasion me a good deal of trouble,—often containing secrets which I do not care to trust even to my own clerks. It is amusing to guess the issue: the consuls are in great disgrace, owing to C. Memmius the candidate having declared in the senate the contract which he and his competitor Domitius<sup>b</sup> had made with the consuls,—that if through their influence they should get to be made consuls, they both bound themselves in the sum of 400,000 sesterii (3700*l.*) to produce three augurs, who would assert that they had been present at the passing of a law for giving military command to the consuls in the provinces they desired, though no such law had ever passed; and two consular senators who would say they had been present at the signing of the decree for the consular provinces, though in fact there had not been even any senate assembled. This contract, which was declared to have been made not verbally, but by names and entries in several tablets, was actually produced by Memmius, at the recommendation of Pompeius, with the names inserted. Hereupon Appius<sup>c</sup> was unaltered; he lost nothing. The other consul<sup>d</sup> was confounded, and, I may say, completely prostrate. But Memmius, having broken off the engagement against the wish of Calvinus, had entirely cooled again<sup>e</sup>, and was the more inclined now to think of a dictator, and to favour the suspension of public business and the general licentiousness. Observe the eagerness and freedom of my mind, and my contempt of the Seleucian province<sup>f</sup>, and indeed my agreeable connexion with Cæsar; for this plank alone affords me pleasure in the general shipwreck. Ye gods! with what honour, dignity, and favour, does he treat me, and your, Quintus! I could do no more if I had the command myself. He tells me that Cæsar has kindly given him the choice of a winter legion<sup>g</sup>. Should you not love this man? Who of these others deserve as well of us? But did I tell you that I was lieutenant to Pompeius, and that I was to be out of the city from the 13th of January? This appeared to me convenient for many reasons. But I shall say no more. The rest I must keep till we meet, that you may still look for some news. Remember me kindly to Dionysius, for whom I have not merely reserved, but have even built an apartment. For to the supreme pleasure I take in your return, I derive a great accession from his arrival. The day you come to me I entreat you, by the love you bear me, to remain with your attendants at my house.

LETTER I.

REIVED your feelings, and am very conscious of my own, at our separation; which should make the more pains to prevent any fresh prolongation of my government<sup>1</sup>, as you want of each other may not last long. About Annus Saturninus you have very judiciously. As for the securities, that, as long as you remain in Rome, you do them; and there are some securities upon taking possession<sup>1</sup>, among which on the Memmian and Atilian estates, plus you have done as I wished; especially to him of the 800 sestertia (6660*l.*), would be glad to discharge even by bond (necessary) for that purpose, without the final settlement of my accounts. As to that cross line at the end of your which you remind me about your sister, is this: when I came to Arpinum, as my brother arrived, we first talked, and time, about you; from which I deviated, and you had said to each other in upon the subject of your sister. something from the table, which she rejected. In short, nothing could be milder than my brother, nothing ruder than your sister. I pass over many circumstances, which at the time were more offensive to me than to Quintus himself. Thence I proceeded to Aquinum. Quintus remained at Arcanum; but came to me at Aquinum the next morning, and told me that she had refused to sleep with him,—and that when she went away she continued just in the same humour in which I had seen her. In a word, you may tell her this, if you please, that I thought there was a great want of courtesy in her behaviour that day. I have written to you perhaps more at length than was necessary, that you might perceive there was occasion on your side, likewise, for advice and admonition. Further, I have only to beg that you will execute my commissions before you leave Rome; that you will send me word of all that happens; that you will drive out Pontinius<sup>1</sup>; and that you will take care to let me know as soon as you go. Be assured nothing is dearer or sweeter to me than yourself. I took leave of A. Torquatus with great affection at Minturnæ: he is an excellent man. I wish you would tell him in the course of conversation, that I mentioned him in my letter to you.

LETTER II.

I WRITE this on the 10th of May, being on the point of leaving Pompeianum so as to sleep to-night with Pontius in Trebulanum. From thence I mean to proceed by regular journeys without any delay. While I was at Cumanum, Hortensius came to see me, which I took very kindly. Upon his asking if I had any commands, I gave him a general answer in other respects; but this I particularly requested, that, as far as lay in his power, he would not suffer my government to be prolonged. In which I should be glad if you would confirm him; and assure him that I was very much gratified by his visit, and by his promise of doing this or anything else I might want. In the same cause I have engaged my friend Furnius also, who I saw would be tribune of the people for the year. I had almost a little Rome in my Cuman villa, so great was the concourse in that neighbourhood: whilst my friend Rufio, seeing that he was watched by Vestorius, played a trick upon him; for he never called upon me. Indeed? when Hortensius came, both unwell, and so far; Hortensius too<sup>2</sup>; when a vast number besides; did not he come? No, I say. Did you not see him then? you will say. How could I help seeing him, when I passed through the town of Puteoli? where I bowed to him while he was engaged, I believe, in some business; afterwards I just bid him farewell, when he came on purpose<sup>3</sup> from his villa to ask if I had any commands. Ought one to think him unkind? or ought one not rather to think him in that very circumstance deserving of commendation, that he should not have pressed to be heard<sup>o</sup>? But to return. Do not imagine that I have any other consolation in this great plague than that I hope it will not last more than a year. Many, judging from the custom of others, do not believe me really to wish this; you, who know me, will use all diligence when the time comes for its being settled. When you return from Epirus I beg you to write to me on the subject of the republic if there is anything likely to happen. For we have not yet received satisfactory information how Caesar bare the vote of the senate respecting his authority<sup>p</sup>. There was a report, too, about the people beyond the Po, that they were ordered to elect four magistrates<sup>q</sup>. If this be so, I am afraid of great commotions; but I shall learn something from Pompeius<sup>r</sup>.

LETTER III.

On the 10th of May I came to Pontius in Trebulanum. There your two letters were delivered to me the third day after they had been written. The same day I delivered to Philotimus a letter for you from Pansa's Pompeian villa. At present I have nothing particular to tell you. Pray let me know what are the reports about the republic; for I perceive great apprehensions in the towns here, though much of it is no doubt groundless. But I should be glad to be informed what you think likely to happen, and when. I do not know what letter you wish me to answer; for I have yet received none besides the two, which were delivered to me together in Trebulanum,—one of which contained P. Licinius's proclamation, and was dated the 7th of May—the other was in answer to mine from Minturnæ. I am afraid there may have been something of importance in that which I have not received, to which you wish me to reply. I will put you into favour with Lentulus. I am much pleased with Dionysius. Your servant Nicanor is of great use to me. I have now nothing more to say, and the day already breaks. I intend getting to Beneventum to-day. By my moderation and diligence, I trust I shall give satisfaction. From Pontius' house at Trebulanum, the 11th of May.

LETTER IV.

I CAME to Beneventum the 11th of May, where I received the letter to which you alluded in one that reached me before, and which I answered the same day from Trebulanum by L. Pontius<sup>s</sup>. In-<sup>o</sup> It is probable Rufio and Vestorius might have had some dispute, which was to be referred to Cicero's decision.

<sup>p</sup> I am not ignorant of the term autoritas being applied to such votes of the senate as were prevented from passing into a law. Still it appears to me that the best sense of this passage is by understanding the word to refer to Caesar's authority, which was at this time attacked by the consul Marcellus, who proposed a decree for shortening the period of his command in Gaul, and preventing one who was not present from being elected consul.

deed I have received two at Beneventum; one of which was brought me early in the morning by Funisulanus; the other by my secretary Tullius. The attention you pay to my first and principal commission<sup>t</sup> is exceedingly grateful to me; but your departure weakens my hope. He brought me to this<sup>u</sup>, not because I was altogether satisfied, but because the want of anything better obliged me to consent. Respecting the other, whom you seem to think not unsuitable, I doubt whether my daughter could be brought to admit him, and it would be difficult for your ladies to find out. On my part I have no objection. But you will be gone, and the business must be settled in my absence. You will consider my situation. For if either of us were there, something might be done by means of Servilius to the satisfaction of Servius: as it is, if this should now be approved, I hardly see how it can be managed. I now come to the letter I received by Tullius, and feel much obliged by your attention about Marcellus. If therefore a decree of the senate should be passed, you will let me know: or if not, you will nevertheless accomplish the business<sup>v</sup>,—for it must of necessity be granted to me, and to Bibulus. But I do not doubt that the decree of the senate has already been despatched, especially as the populace have their advantage in it. You have done well about Torquatus. It will be time enough to think of Maso and Ligur when they arrive. As to what Chærippus says<sup>w</sup>, since here also you withhold your opinion; O this province! and must be too be satisfied? He must so far be satisfied, that nothing may come before the senate. Consider what is to be done, or pay down the money; for about the others I do not care. It happens however fortunately that you should have talked with Scrofa. What you say about Pontius is very just. For so it is, that if he comes to Brundisium before the 1st of June, there will be less occasion to press M. Annus and Tullius. I like what you heard from Sicinius<sup>x</sup>, provided the exception does not affect anybody to whom I am under obligations. But I will consider of it: for I approve the thing itself. What I may determine about my journey, and what Pompeius will do about the five prefects<sup>y</sup>, when I have learned from him, I will let you know. Respecting Oppius, you have done right to assure him of the payment of the 800 sesteria (66600): and now that you have Philotimus with you, bring it is to be supposed that when Cicero proceeded to Beneventum, Pontius at the same time went up to Rome.

<sup>t</sup> This probably refers to the re-marriage of his daughter, who appears to have been separated from Crasipes by a divorce. It must not be forgotten that divorces at that time were exceedingly common.

<sup>u</sup> It is not certain of whom Cicero is speaking: it appears to have been some person who had proposed to marry Tullia, and who had induced Cicero to listen to his offer. She did in fact marry P. Cornelius Dolabella.

<sup>v</sup> The object of Cicero was probably to get a decree authorising him to raise a supply of troops, which he considers necessary for himself and Bibulus, on account of the hostility of the Parthians who bordered on their provinces.

<sup>w</sup> He seems to have brought up some demand against Cicero, the nature of which is not known.

<sup>x</sup> It was usual to issue a proclamation upon entering a provincial government. Cicero had been inquiring what others had done on similar occasions, and it is to this that Sicinius's exception must be supposed to allude.

ness to an end, and make up the account. I love me before you go away, enable me to go on<sup>a</sup>. You will have relieved me great source of uneasiness. I have now to all the contents of your letters: though I most omitted your want of paper<sup>a</sup>. This concern, if your deficiency obliges you to do. Take then 200 sesterii (17. 16s.), in supply yourself, though the smallness of it shows my own parsimony in this respect; demands from you an account of all that I have talked of. If you have any certain income of Cæsar, I hope to hear from you; and I am particularly by Pontinius about every-shorter in writing to you, from my uncertainty whether you are at Rome or already set out. As long as I remain in this ignorance, I will still write a few lines, rather than suffer an opportunity of sending to you to pass without a letter. At the same time I have now nothing to ask of you, or to tell you. I have made all my requests, which you will execute as you promised; when I have any news, I will tell you. One thing however I shall not cease to urge as long as I suppose you to remain in Rome, that you would leave that business completed respecting the account with Cæsar. I look eagerly for your letters; especially that I may know the time of your departure.

LETTER V.

I positively nothing to say: for I have nothing to desire of you, considering there has been nothing omitted, nor anything to tell you, for anything, and have no room for joking—so I press upon me. Know this however, that this on the morning of the 15th of May, I went out from Venusia. On this day it is that something will be done in the senate. I hope your letters follow me, by which I may be made acquainted with all facts, and with the current reports. I shall receive them at Brundisium, for there I wait for Pontinius till the day which you

I will give you a particular account of the conversations I may have at Tarentum on the subject of the republic: I wish to know how long I may properly stay,—that is, how long you are likely to come, that I may know to whom I ought to deliver my letters, and may not deliver them. But before you go, at all events let us be settled of the 20 and the 800 sesterii (and 6660l.). I wish you would consider a thing of the very first importance and what I have begun to entertain<sup>b</sup> by recommendation, I may complete by your

LETTER VII.

I SEND you a letter every day, or rather each day, shorter; for I become every day more apprehensive that you may have set out for Epirus. However, that you may see I have attended to your request, Pompeius says he shall present five new prefects as before, with exemption of service, and with the authority of magistrates<sup>c</sup>. After spending three days with Pompeius in his own house, I am going to Brundisium this 20th of May. I leave him an excellent citizen, and fully prepared to repel the evils which are apprehended. I shall hope to get a letter from you, that I may know both what you are doing, and where you are.

LETTER VIII.

It is now twelve days that I have been detained at Brundisium, partly by indisposition; from which however I am now recovered, having been free from fever; partly by the expectation of Pontinius's arrival, of which I have not yet received any intimation. But I am expecting to sail. If you are at Rome, which I scarcely suppose, but if you are, I should exceedingly wish you to attend to the following circumstance. I received information from Rome that my friend Milo complained in his letters of my unkindness, because Philotimus was a party in the purchase of his goods<sup>d</sup>. This I desired to be done by the advice of C. Duonius, whom I knew to be much attached to Milo, and such a one as you esteem him. His intentions and mine were, first, that the property might thus come under my control, and that no ill-disposed purchaser might rob him of his slaves, of whom he has a great many with him; then, that the security he had wished to provide for Fausta<sup>e</sup>

<sup>c</sup> Different conjectures have been formed respecting the text and the meaning of this sentence. It seems to me most probable, that Pompeius was allowed to nominate to Cicero's prefectures, which were often honorary, and while they gave authority, admitted of exemption from service. Cicero only insisted on excluding all persons concerned in traffic. [See letter 11 of this book.] The proper business of the prefect appears to have been to determine causes in such places where there were no authorised magistrates.

<sup>d</sup> Philotimus was a freed-man of Terentia, Cicero's wife. Milo had been found guilty of the death of Clodius, and in consequence went into a voluntary exile at Marselles; and his debts being very great, his estate was sold by public auction for the satisfaction of his creditors.

LETTER VI.

Tarentum the 18th of May. Having waited for Pontinius, I thought it best to spend an intermediate time with Pompeius, till I receive: especially as I found that Pompeius, and even begged me to be with his house every day: to which I consented,—for I shall get from him many informations on the subject of the republic; besides he was furnished with instructions for my new office. But I begin now to be res to me to be the best interpretation of the most consistent with the context.

The word probably refers to some expression in the text, or, it may be, to the cross line spoken of in the book. This letter contains an unusual number of sentences, and short allusions, which give considerable doubt of the true meaning. The friendship he had begun to have with the sums stated here and elsewhere, as with him and Oppius, were apparently due to might be ratified; added to which, if anything could be saved, that I might the more easily save it. Now I should be glad if you would examine into the whole affair,—for accounts are often exaggerated. But if he complains, if he writes to his friends, if Fausta is of the same mind, do not let Philotimus continue to have any concern in the property, contrary to Milo's wishes; for so I told him in person, and he engaged to do. It was no great object to me. But if what I have heard is undeserving of notice, you will judge what is right. Speak to Duronius. I have written also to Camillus, and to Lamia; and the rather, because I could not depend upon your being in Rome. In short, you will determine what you think most consistent with my honour, my reputation, and my interest.

LETTER IX.

I ARRIVED at Actium<sup>1</sup> the 15th of June, having feasted like the Salii<sup>2</sup> at Corcyra, and Sybotis, upon the presents which Arcus and my friend Eutychides<sup>3</sup> had splendidly and kindly provided for me. I preferred going from Actium by land, after having had a very unpleasant voyage. The doubling of Leucate too seemed to be attended with difficulty; and I did not think it becoming to proceed to Patræ in a small vessel without my equipage. I daily study myself, and direct my attendants, to carry into effect my determination (in which you often encouraged my speed), to discharge this office, which is out of the common<sup>4</sup> course, with the utmost moderation, and the utmost forbearance. I hope that the Parthians will be quiet, and that fortune will favour me: I shall do my part. Pray take care to let me know what you are doing, where you will be at successive times, how you left my affairs at Rome, and above all about the twenty and the eight hundred<sup>5</sup> sestertia (166*l.* and 666*l.*). This you will accomplish in one letter carefully despatched, so that it may reach me. But (though you are now absent, while the business of the provinces is not under consideration, yet will, as you wrote me word, be present at the time) remember to provide through your own influence, and through all my friends, especially through Hortensius, that my year of service may remain in its present state, and that no addition may be decreed. I am so earnest in this request, that I doubt if I should not even beg you to contend against any intercalation<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>3</sup> Arcus and Eutychides were freed-men belonging to Atticus, whose house at Butthrotum was near to Corcyra and Sybotis, through which Cicero passed after he had crossed the Adriatic. Eutychides is mentioned before, book iv. letter 15.

<sup>6</sup> This is said jestingly. The irregularities of the year, previous to Cæsar's reformation of the calendar, used to be rectified by the occasional insertion of a month, consist-

But I must not impose every burden upon you. At least however be firm upon the subject of the year. My affectionate and dear boy Cicero sends his compliments to you. I have always, as you know, had a regard for Dionysius; but I esteem him more and more every day, and particularly because he loves you, and is continually talking about you.

LETTER X.

HAVING reached Athens the 25th of June, I have been now three days expecting Pontinius, but have yet heard nothing certain about his arrival. I assure you my thoughts have been entirely engaged upon you; and though I was naturally led to this by my own feelings, yet these have been the more lively from the recollection that I was treading in your steps. In short, our whole conversation is about you. But you perhaps wish rather to hear something about me. I have to tell you, then, that hitherto there has been no expense incurred, either publicly or privately upon me, or any of my train. Nothing is received under the sanction of the Julian law<sup>1</sup>; nothing from those with whom we lodge. My attendants are all resolved to support my reputation. So far all is well. This being observed, has called forth much discourse and commendation among the Greeks. In what remains to be done, I study to conduct myself, as I understood you to approve. But it will be time to take credit for these matters when we arrive at the peroration and conclusion of the whole. The rest of my concerns are of such a nature that I often reproach myself for not having devised some means of escaping from this employment. How little is it adapted to my habits! How true is that saying—"Every one to his own trade!" You will say—"What has already happened? you have not yet entered upon business." I know not, but I apprehend there is worse to come,—though I bear this, as I hope and believe, to all appearance admirably; but I am worried in my inward feelings, by the many things which are every day arrogantly said or concealed in anger and petulance, and every kind of foolish weakness, which I do not specify,—not from any wish to hide them from you, but because they are irremediable. When I am returned safe, you shall admire my patience: it is a virtue I am deeply studying. But enough of this. Though I had little else to write about, not being able to guess even what you are doing or where you are. Nor was I ever so long in ignorance of my own affairs; what has been done about Cæsar's business, what about Milo's; and I have not only seen nobody, but have not so much as heard any report to inform me of what is going on in the republic. If therefore you know anything about these matters, with which you think I should like to be acquainted, you will confer a great kindness upon me by letting me hear it. What is there besides? Nothing truly but this, that I am highly delighted with Athens, with the city itself, and the ing of more or fewer days, at the discretion of the pontifex, between the 23d and 24th of February. This was called an intercalary month.

<sup>1</sup> By the Julian law the public officers of Rome were entitled to certain articles of provision in the towns through which they passed.

If there is any good, it is ound in Ariatus, with whom I lodge,—for I p your, or rather my Xeno, to Quintus; but uses are so near, that we pass whole days r. As soon as you can, let me hear you that I may know what you do, where you d, above all, when you will be in Rome.

LETTER XI.

to justify their delinquency. But if this be found insufficient, I shall adopt severer measures; for hitherto I have been gentle and lenient; and, as I hope, not without some effect. But, as some say, I have calculated upon this forbearance only for one year: take care then that I do not lose my character by any prolongation of my government. I now come back to what you desire of me. With regard to the prefects, there shall be an exemption of service for any you<sup>s</sup> please; only name them: I shall not hesitate, as I did in the case of Apuleius. I love Xeno as much as you do, and am confident that he is sensible of it. I have put you in the highest favour with Patron, and the rest of these effeminate philosophers<sup>1</sup>; and have done no more than you deserved; for he told me that you had thrice written to him, to assure him that in consequence of his letter I would take care of that business<sup>2</sup>; which he took very kindly. But upon Patron's applying to me, to request that your Areopagus would cancel the decree they had made in the prætorship of Polycharmus, it appeared both to Xeno, and afterwards to Patron himself, more proper that I should write to Memmius, who had gone to Mitylene the very day before I arrived at Athens, in order that he might signify to his friends his consent to the measure. For Xeno was persuaded that the Areopagus would never grant it against the will of Memmius. But Memmius had already given up all thoughts of building: he was, however, displeased with Patron; which made me write particularly to him a letter, of which I send you a copy. I wish you to comfort Pilia for my sake<sup>3</sup>: for I will tell you; you need not mention it to her; I received a packet, in which was Pilia's letter: I took it, opened it, read it. It was written with great feeling. The letters you received from Brundisium, without any from me, were despatched at a time when I was not well. For I would not have you put off with that servile excuse<sup>4</sup> of business. Take care to let me hear everything; but especially take care of your own health.

LETTER XII.

A SEA voyage is a serious thing, even in July. We were five days coming from Athens to Delus. On the 6th of July we proceeded from the Piræus<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It does not appear that the governors of provinces were limited in their appointment of prefects. Cicero only excluded such as carried on any traffic. [See above, letter 7 of this book.] The translation here offered is new, but is most consonant to the words of the original thus pointed, "in prefectis, excusatio illis quos volēs: deferro."

<sup>3</sup> Memmius had been obliged to quit Rome, and had taken up his residence at Athens, where he got from the council of the Areopagus a grant to build upon the site of a school of Epicurus. This the supporters of that philosophy were anxious to prevent.

<sup>4</sup> It has been doubted to what this alludes, and indeed it is one of those private circumstances which it is impossible to ascertain; but it appears to me most probable that some letter from Pilia to Atticus had fallen by mistake into Cicero's hands, and that it contained some expressions of uneasiness, which Cicero takes this opportunity of requesting her husband to soothe.

<sup>5</sup> The meaning of the original is uncertain. I have supposed it to be "an excuse of being busy;" which he represents as an excuse fit for a slave, who was forced to work.

to Zoster with a troublesome wind, which detained us there the next day. On the 8th we had a pleasant passage to Ceo. From thence we went to Gyarus with a strong gale, but not unfavourable. We completed our course to Scyrus, and thence to Delus, to both of them quicker than we wished. You are acquainted with the undecked vessels of the Rhodians; there is nothing less calculated to resist the waves. I had, therefore, determined not to hurry, nor to stir from Delus till the indications from the heights should be favourable. As soon as I heard of Messala, I immediately wrote to you from Gyarus; and I also communicated my opinion to Hortensius<sup>7</sup>, with whom I fully sympathised. But I am expecting a letter from you informing me what is said of that judgment, and indeed upon the whole state of the republic, and that a statesman-like letter, since you are reading over my treatise on Government with my friend Thallumetus<sup>8</sup>; so that I may learn not only what is doing (for that even your grave client Helenius could tell), but what will be done hereafter. By the time you read this, the consuls will be appointed. You will be able to perceive with some certainty everything relating to Cæsar, to Pompeius, to the trials themselves. But, I beseech you, since you remain in Rome, clear off my business. What I forgot to answer you about the brick-work<sup>9</sup>, I request you to get done. Respecting the water, if anything can be done, I beg you to manage it with your usual kindness. I do from my own sense of the subject, as well as from your representation, consider it of real importance: therefore accomplish something. If Philippus has asked you to do anything in his affair, I should be glad if you would gratify him. I will write more to you when I am settled; I am now completely in the middle of the sea.

LETTER XIII.

I ARRIVED at Ephesus the 22d of July, the five hundred and sixtieth day after the battle of Bovilla<sup>1</sup>. The voyage was performed without danger, and without sickness; but slowly, owing to the weakness of the undecked Rhodian vessels. Of the concourse of deputations, and individuals, and the incredible multitude which came to greet me at Samos, and in an astonishing manner at Ephesus, I imagine you have already heard; or may say, "how does it concern me?" However, both the farmers of the revenue addressed me with as much zeal as if I had come with a command; and the Greeks, as if I had been an Ephesian prætor<sup>2</sup>. From which I know you will understand that my

boasting of so many years is now brought to the test<sup>4</sup>. But as I hope I shall put in practice the lessons I have learned from you; and shall be able to satisfy all parties; and the more easily, because in my province the compositions<sup>5</sup> have already been made. But enough of this; especially as Cæstius informed me, while I was at dinner, that he should set out this very night. I have attended to your little concerns<sup>6</sup> at Ephesus; and to Therminus, (who previously to my arrival had generously promised his assistance to all your friends,) yet I have presented Philogenes and Seius, and have recommended Xeno of Apollonia. He promised to do everything you wished. I have besides explained to Philogenes the account of what I borrowed<sup>7</sup> from you. So much for this also. I return to the affairs of the city. I entreat you by your fortunes, since you remain in Rome, first of all to support and secure this, that my government may be but for the year, that there be even no intercalation<sup>8</sup>. In the next place, finish my commissions; especially if anything can be done in that domestic<sup>9</sup> business, in which you know my difficulty: then have a regard to Cæsar<sup>10</sup>, whose friendship I have solicited at your recommendation; nor do I regret it. And if you know how much it concerns me to be informed and regardful of what is doing in the republic, (doing: nay, rather what is hereafter to take place,) write everything to me, and exactly; particularly whether the state of the judgments that are either made, or to be made, is attended with difficulty. About the water<sup>11</sup>, as you think it worth while. If Philippus should want anything, I shall be obliged to you to attend to it<sup>12</sup>.

LETTER XIV.

TILL I am settled in some place, you must not expect me to send you either long letters, or always in my own hand; but when I have time, I will do both. I am now pursuing my journey on a hot and dusty road. I wrote to you yesterday from Ephesus; this I send from Tralles. I expect to be in my province the 1st of August. From that day, if you love me, endeavour to secure the termination of my government after one year. In the mean time I have received intelligence such as I could wish; first, that the Parthians are quiet; then, that the contracts with the farmers of the revenue are completed; lastly, that the sedition of the soldiers has been allayed by Appius, and their pay delivered to them up to the middle of July. I am wonderfully well received in Asia. My arrival has occasioned not the smallest expense to anybody. I hope all my attendants will have regard to my reputation. I have great apprehensions; but hope for the best.

LETTER XVI.

WHILE I am on my journey, and actually on the road, the messengers of the public renters are setting out; yet I have thought it right to steal a little time, that you may not think me regardless of your injunction. Accordingly, I have stopped in the road to send you shortly this information, which should have occupied a larger space. My arrival, which was eagerly expected in this miserable and utterly ruined province, took place the last day of July. During three days that I staid at Laodicea, three at Apamea, and three at Synnada, I heard of nothing but the inability of the people to pay the head money imposed upon them; the universal sale of goods; the groans and lamentations of the cities, the fatal traces, not of a man, but of some savage beast. In short, I am sick of everything, even of my life. The wretched cities, however, find some relief in being free from any expense either on my account or that of my lieutenants, questors, or anybody else. For I decline to accept not only forage, and what is allowed by the Julian law, but even my fire-wood; nor does anybody receive a single thing besides four beds, and a roof to cover them; in many places, not so much as that, for we more commonly remain under a tent. Hence we have a surprising concourse from the country, from the villages, and from every house. Indeed they revive again at my approach, at the justice, the moderation, the clemency of your Cicero; so that he has exceeded the expectations of all people. Appius°, upon hearing that I was coming, went into the remotest part of the province, as far as Tarsus, where he holds a session. I hear nothing of the Parthians; but some, who are lately arrived, relate that our cavalry have been defeated by the barbarians°. Bibulus does not even yet think of going into his province"; which people attribute to this, that he wishes to remain there as late as he can. I am hastening to join the army, which is two days distant.

LETTER XVII.

I HAVE received from Rome a packet of letters without one from you; which, if only you were there, and were well, I attribute to the fault of Philotimus, not to you. I dictate this sitting in my carriage, on my way to the camp, from which I am distant two days' journey. In a few days I shall have sure persons to whom I can deliver my letters, therefore I reserve myself for that. However, though I would rather you should hear it from others, I conduct myself in the province with such moderation, that not a penny is spent upon any of my people. This is accomplished also by the attention of the lieutenants, and tribunes, and prefects, for they are all zealous for my honour.

° Appius was Cicero's predecessor in the province of Cilicia.

† This is spoken, in the Greek manner, of people unacquainted with the Roman customs and discipline.

" Syria.

Our friend Lepta is admirable<sup>v</sup>. But I must be quick. I will tell you everything fully in a few days. The younger Deiotarus, who has received from the senate the title of king, has taken our Cicero<sup>w</sup> with him into his kingdom. While I am in my summer quarters, I considered it to be the best place for the boys. Sestius has informed me of the conversation he had with you on the subject of my domestic and greatest concern<sup>x</sup>, and what was your opinion. I beseech you, pay every attention to that business: and let me know what can be done, and what you think. Sestius likewise said that Hortensius had mentioned something about extending the term of my government. He had distinctly promised me in Cumanum that he would support my release at the end of twelve months. If you have any regard for me, fortify this post<sup>y</sup>. It cannot be told how unwillingly I am kept away from you. Besides, I expect that this honour, which I derive from my moderation, will be the more distinguished, if I soon retire, as it happened to Scævola, who presided in Asia only nine months. Appius, when he understood that I was approaching, removed from Laodicea as far as Tarsus. There he holds a session, while I am in the province; but I shall not quarrel with him for this wrong, for I have enough upon my hands in healing the wounds which have been inflicted on the province, which I endeavour to do with the least censure upon him. But I wish you would tell our friend Brutus that Appius has not behaved handsomely in going away as far as he could upon my approach.

LETTER XVIII.

How I wish you were in Rome, if it happens that you are not there, for I have no certain information, excepting that I have received two letters from you dated the 19th of July, in which it was mentioned that you were going into Epirus about the beginning of August. But whether you are in Rome or in Epirus, the Parthians have passed the Euphrates under the conduct of Pacorus, son of Orodes, king of the Parthians, with almost all his forces. There is yet no news of Bibulus's arrival in Syria. Cassius is in the city of Antioch with his whole army. I am with my army at Cybistra, in Cappadocia, at the foot of Mount Taurus. The enemy is in the Cyrrhestica, which is the part of Syria nearest to my province. I have written to the senate an account of this state of affairs<sup>z</sup>. If you are at Rome, you will see if you think my letter should be delivered; and many things, nay, everything which require your kind attention, the sum of which is, that between the slaying and the offering<sup>a</sup>, as they say, no additional time or burden may be laid upon me. For in this weak state of the army, and deficiency of allies, at least such as can be depended upon, my best security is the winter. If that season arrives without the enemy's having passed into my province, the only thing I fear is that the senate, under the apprehension of domestic disturbances, may be unwilling to let Pompeius go away. But if they send somebody else in the spring, I do not care, provided no addition be made to my time. So much then, if you are in Rome. But if you are gone, or indeed if you remain there, this is the state of my affairs: I have no distrust; and following, as I believe, prudent counsels—and possessing, I hope, a good body of men, I feel to be in a safe position, abounding in corn, almost looking down upon Cilicia, and convenient for moving. My army is small, but, I trust, unanimous in affection towards me, and likely to be doubled by the arrival of Deiotarus with all his forces. I have much more faithful allies than anybody else has had, being struck with my kindness and forbearance. I am making a levy of Roman citizens, and transporting corn from the fields into places of safety. If it is necessary, we shall defend ourselves by arms; if not, by the nature of the country. Therefore be of good courage; for I see you, and am as sensible of your friendly sympathy as if you were actually present. But I beg of you, should the consideration of my case be put off till the first of January, that you would, if possible, be in Rome at that time. I shall feel quite secure if you are there. The consuls are my friends, and the tribune of the people, Furnius; still I have need of your assiduity, prudence, and influence. It is a most important time; but I am ashamed of using many words with you. Our young Cicero is with Deiotarus, but if necessary they shall be removed to Rhodes. If you are in Rome, write to me with your usual exactness; if in Epirus, yet send me one of your messengers, that both you may know what I am doing, and I what you do, and mean to do. I attend to the concerns of your friend Brutus in a manner that he would not do for himself. But I now bring forth my ward<sup>b</sup>, without defending him, for it is a slow and fruitless business. Yet I will endeavour to give satisfaction, even to you, which is harder than to Brutus himself; but I will assuredly satisfy both.

LETTER XIX.

I HAD just sealed the letter which I imagine you have read, written with my own hand, and containing an account of everything, when Appius's messenger hastily delivered to me your letter of the 21st of September, the forty-seventh day from his leaving Rome. Ah, what a distance! By that I make no doubt you waited for Pompeius's return from Ariminum, and are now gone to Epirus; and I fear you will be not less, but, as you say, more anxious in Epirus than I am here. I have written the province, with the design of making the Armenian Artavasdes, and the Parthians them- selves conceive that they were excluded from Cappadocia. After being encamped five days at Cybistra in Cappadocia, I was informed that the Parthians were at a long distance from that passage of Cappadocia, and were rather threatening Cilicia. Therefore I immediately made my way into Cilicia through the passes of Mount Taurus. I came to Tarsus the 5th of October; thence I went to Mount Amanus, which divides Syria from Cilicia by the opposite course of the waters<sup>b</sup>. These mountains were full of eternal enemies. Here, on the 13th of October, we killed a great number of them; and Pontinus having advanced by night, and myself the next morning, we took and burned the forts, which were strongly guarded. I was saluted Imperator<sup>c</sup>. I occupied for a few days the very same position, at Issus, which, in his expedition against Darius, had been held by Alexander, not a little better general than either you or me. There I remained five days; and having spoiled and laid waste the Amanus, I departed. For you know that as there are certain things called panics, so there are also the empty rumours of war. The rumour of our approach both encouraged Cassius, who was shut up in Antioch, and alarmed the Parthians; so that Cas- sius pursued them with advantage as they retreated from the city. In this retreat Osaces, one of the Parthian generals of great authority, received a wound, of which he died a few days after. My name was respected in Syria. In the mean time Bibulus arrived. I imagine he wanted to be equal with me in this empty title. He began to seek for laurels in the Amanus, as if they were strewed upon a cake<sup>d</sup>. But he lost the whole of his first cohort, and the centurion of the first division, a man distinguished in his situation, Asinius Dento, and the other officers of the cohort, and Sextus Lucilius, a military tribune, son to T. Gævius Cæpio, a rich and splendid man. In truth he sus- tained an ugly blow, both in itself and in the time when it happened. I invested Pindenissus with a ditch and rampart; it was a strong place belong- ing to the free Cilicians, and had time out of mind been in arms against us. The people were a fierce and barbarous race, prepared with all the means of defence. We accomplished the business by a large mound, fascines, a lofty tower, great quantity of machines<sup>e</sup>, a numerous body of archers, great fatigue and equipage, and many wounds received, but the army safe. The Saturnalia were truly joyous. I gave up the spoil, excepting the horses, to the soldiers. The slaves were sold on the third day of the Saturnalia. While I write this in the tribunal<sup>f</sup>, the sum amounts to 12,000 sester tia (96,000*l*.) I shall leave the command of the army to my brother Quintus, to be taken from hence into winter quarters in a part of the country that is ill pacified, and am going myself to Laodicea. So much for this. But let me revert to what I have omitted. When you particularly advise me; and which is more than all, in what you labour with so much earnestness; that I should satisfy even this Ligurian scoffer<sup>m</sup>; may I die, if anything could be said more elegantly. But I do not call this forbearance, for that seems to imply a virtue opposed to pleasure, while in my life I never felt so great a pleasure as I do from this integrity of conduct. Nor is it the reputation (which is very great), but the thing itself that delights me. In short, such has been its value, I did not know myself, nor was I aware what I could do in this kind. I am justly proud. Nothing can be more honourable. In the mean time, it is something splendid that Ariobarzanes should live and reign by my assistance. I have preserved the king and the kingdom, as it were, in passing, by prudence and authority, and making myself inaccessible to his enemies, not merely shut against their presents. At the same time, not the smallest thing has been received from Cappadocia; and I even hope that during the whole year of my government not a farthing of expense will be incurred in the province. Brutus, who was desponding<sup>n</sup>, I have cheered as much as I could. I love him no less than thou: I had almost said, than thee. This is all I had to tell you. I am now preparing to send a public account to Rome, which will be more full than if I had sent from the Amanus. But am I to understand that you will not be in Rome? Everything depends upon the first of March<sup>o</sup>. For I am apprehensive that when the business of the province is taken into consideration, if any resistance is made on the part of Cæsar<sup>p</sup>, I may be continued. If you were there to attend to this, I should have no fears. I come now to the affairs of the city, with which, after a long ignorance, I have at length been made acquainted by your most acceptable letter of the 28th of December. Your freed-man Philogenes took great care to send it by a circuitous and not very safe route. For that, which you say was delivered to Lenius's servant, I had not received<sup>q</sup>. I was pleased with what you say of Cæsar respecting both the decree of the senate<sup>r</sup> and your own hopes. If he submits to this, I am safe. That Leius should have scorched himself in this Platorian conflagration, I am not so much concerned<sup>s</sup>. I want to know why Luccæius should have been so vehement about Q. Cassius, and what has been done. As soon as I get to Laodicea, I am desired to present your nephew Quintus with his robe<sup>t</sup> of manhood. I shall endeavour carefully to regulate his conduct. He, from whom I have derived such great assistance<sup>u</sup>, was to come to me at Laodicea, as he said, with the young Ciceros. I am expecting a letter from Epirus to bring me an account, not only of your occupations, but also of your retirement. Nicanor is in office, and liberally treated by me. I think of sending him to Rome with the public despatches, both for their more careful conveyance, and at the same time that he may bring me back certain intelligence of you, and from you. I am obliged to Alexis<sup>v</sup> for his repeated salutations: but why does he not by his own letters follow the example of my Alexis<sup>w</sup> to you? I am looking out for a horse<sup>x</sup> for Phœmius. But it is time to stop. Take care of yourself, and let me know when you think of returning to Rome. Again and again, farewell. When I was at Ephesus, I carefully recommended your affairs and your friends to Thermus; and I now do the same by letter; and I have understood that he is of himself very desirous of serving you. I should be glad if you would use your influence about Pammenus's house, as I before mentioned to you, that what the boy has, through your and my assistance, may not by any means be disturbed. I consider this as a point of honour to both of us, and it will, besides, be particularly acceptable to me.

LETTER XXI.

I was very glad to hear that you had arrived safe in Epirus, and had, as you say, an agreeable passage. I am rather concerned that you will not be in Rome at a period so important to me; but I comfort myself with thinking that you will not like to winter there, and unnecessarily to be out of the way<sup>y</sup>. Cassius, the brother of your friend Q. Cassius, had sent the letter, of which you ask me the meaning, in a more modest style than that which he sent afterwards, where he pretends to have put an end to the Parthian war. They had indeed retreated from Antioch before the arrival of Bibulus; but not in consequence of any success on our part. They are now in winter quarters in the Cyrrhestica, and threaten us with a great war. For the son of Orodes, the Parthian king, is in our province<sup>z</sup>; and Deiotarus, whose son is engaged to the daughter of Artavasdes<sup>a</sup>, from whom it might

That Atticus was himself fond of music may be conjectured from book iv. letter 16: "Ex quibus (Britannicis mancipiis) nullos puto te literis aut musicis eruditos expectare."

nobody received anything. For this pollution<sup>c</sup> I am indebted to Q. Titinius. The campaign being ended, I gave the command of the winter quarters and of Cilicia to my brother Quintus. I sent into Cyprus, Q. Volusius, the son-in-law of your friend Tiberius, a steady man, and besides wonderfully abstemious, to remain there a few days, lest the few Roman citizens, who carry on business in those parts, should think that justice was denied them; for it is illegal to summon the Cypriots out of the island. I went myself on the 5th of January from Tarsus into Asia<sup>d</sup>; I cannot tell you with what admiration of the cities of Cilicia, and above all of the Tarsians. And when I had passed the range of the Taurus, a prodigious expectation was raised in the districts of Asia under my jurisdiction, which in six months of my government had received no letter<sup>e</sup> from me, and had seen no guest<sup>f</sup>. For, before me, that time had always been employed in a species of traffic, by which the opulent cities gave great sums of money to be excused having soldiers quartered upon them in the winter. The Cypriots gave as much as two hundred Attic talents (nearly 10,000*l.*); from which island (I speak not hyperbolically, but truly) no money whatever will be exacted under my government. In return for these benefits, at which they express their astonishment, I do not permit them to decree any honours to me, except in words; I forbid all statues, temples, chariots; nor am I burdensome to the cities in any other way—but perhaps I am to you, while I proclaim all this about myself. Bear with me, however, if you love me; for it is you who desired me to do it. In short, I have made my progress through Asia in such a manner, that even famine, than which nothing is more wretched, and which was felt at this time in my part of Asia, owing to the entire failure of the crops, might seem a thing to be wished for by me<sup>g</sup>. Wherever I have been, I have employed no force, no legal process, no insult; but have by authority and exhortation, prevailed upon those Greeks<sup>h</sup> and Roman citizens, who had corn in store, to promise a large supply to the people. February the 13th, on which day I am writing, I have appointed to hold a session at Laodicea for the affairs of Cybira; the 15th of March for those of Apamea; and at the same time I mean to hold one for Synnada, Pamphylia, (when I shall look out for a horn for Phemius<sup>i</sup>) Lycaonia<sup>j</sup>, and Isauria. The middle of May I shall return into Cilicia, to spend there the month of June, I hope unmolested by the Parthians. If things go as I wish, I shall employ July in passing again through the province on my return; for I arrived within the province at Laodicea, in the consulship of Sulpicius and Marcellus, the 31st of July. I must set out on my departure the 29th of July, having first obtained my brother Quintus's consent to his being left in command; which will be very much against both his inclination and mine; but it cannot with propriety be avoided; especially as I cannot even now detain that excellent man Pontinius; for Posthumus, perhaps also Posthumia, snatches him away to Rome. You have here my plans. Now hear what relates to Brutus. Brutus is well acquainted with certain creditors of the Salaminians of Cyprus, M. Scaptius, and P. Matinius, whom he has particularly recommended to me. Matinius I do not know. Scaptius came to me in the camp. I promised that I would take care, for Brutus' sake, that the Salaminians should pay him the money that was owing to him. He thanked me; and at the same time asked to be made a prefect. I said I made it a rule never to appoint anybody engaged in traffic, as I had before told you. When Cn. Pompeius asked me, I gave to him the same answer; likewise to Torquatus, on his application for M. Lenius, your friend; and to several others. If he wished to be made a prefect for the sake of his bond, I would take care he should recover it. He thanked me, and took his leave. Appius had formerly given a few troops of horse to this Scaptius, for the sake of repressing the Salaminians; and had made him a prefect. But he harassed the people of Salamis; and I ordered the horse to remove from Cyprus, which Scaptius took very ill. However, that I might keep my promise to him, when the Salaminians came to me at Tarsus, and Scaptius with them, I ordered them to pay the money. They said a great deal about the bond, and about the ill-usage they had received from Scaptius. I said I could not listen to it. I exhorted; I begged, in return for the kindness I had shown towards their city, that they would conclude the business; at last I said I should compel them. Upon this they not only did not refuse, but they added, that they would pay then out of me. For as I had not accepted what they had been used to give to their governors, they in some measure gave it from my revenue; indeed the amount of Scaptius's debt was less than the prætorian tribute. I commended them. Right, says Scaptius, but let us reckon up the amount. In the mean time, while I had declared in my opening proclamation, composed from different models<sup>1</sup>, that I should maintain the interest of one per cent. per month, together with what accrued at the end of the year, he by the terms of his bond demanded four per cent. "What do you mean," said I; "can I act contrary to my proclamation?" He then produced a decree of the senate in the consulship of Lentulus and Philippus, that whoever obtained the province of Cilicia, should pronounce judgment according to that bond. I was at first struck with horror; for it would have been the ruin of the city. But I find two decrees of the senate in the same year respecting this bond. The Salaminians, when they were desirous of raising money at Rome, were prevented by the Gabinian law. Upon which these friends of Brutus, relying upon his influence, offered to advance the money at four per cent. per month, if it could be authorised by a decree of the senate. Through the favour of Brutus, a decree was passed, "that no detriment should arise to the Salaminians, nor to those who furnished the money." They accordingly paid the money. But it afterwards occurred to them, that the decree would be of no use to them, since the Gabinian law prohibited the establishing a right upon the terms of a bond. Thereupon another decree of the senate was passed, "that this bond should have the same validity as others." But to return: while I was explaining this, Scaptius drew me aside, saying that he did not mean to oppose my judgment; but that they believed they owed him two hundred talents (about 10,000*l.*), and this sum he was willing to accept: that they really owed him something less; but he wished me to bring them to this agreement. Very well, said I. So I called them to me, after Scaptius had retired, and asked them what they offered, and what was the amount of their debt. They replied, one hundred and six talents, (about 5100*l.*). I reported this to Scaptius. The man began to clamour. "What is the use of this?" said I. "Compare your accounts." They sat down, and made their computation, which agreed to a sixpence. They said they were ready to pay it, and pressed him to take it. Here Scaptius again called me aside, and begged that I would leave the matter as it stood. I gave way to his shameless request; and when the Greeks complained, and desired leave to deposit the money in some temple<sup>1</sup>, I did not grant it. Everybody present exclaimed that nothing could be more shameless than Scaptius, who was not satisfied with one per cent. per month, with the annual compound interest; some said nothing could be more foolish. But to me he appeared more impudent than foolish. For thus he either satisfied himself with good security at one per cent., or took his chance for four per cent. on security which was not good. This is the statement of my case; which must be approved by Brutus, or he will no longer deserve our regard. It will assuredly be approved by his uncle<sup>2</sup>; especially as a decree of the senate was lately passed. I believe after your departure, on the subject of creditors, that one per cent. should constantly be taken without compound interest. What difference this makes, if I rightly know your fingers<sup>3</sup>, you have certainly computed. On this subject, by-the-bye, Luceius complains to me by letter that there is great danger lest these decrees should lead, by the fault of the senate, to cancelling the old accounts. He refers to the mischief, which C. Julius formerly occasioned by the procrastination of a single day<sup>4</sup>; the state never was in greater jeopardy. But to return to the business: consider my case against Brutus; if this may be called a case, where nothing can with honour be said in opposition; especially as I have left the whole affair open. What I have to say besides, relates to my private concerns. On that secret business<sup>5</sup> I

It is evident that Cicero here means Tullius, and that he so designates him on account of his misconduct.

BOOK VI.

LETTER I.

RECEIVED your letter at Laodicea on the fifth before the festival of the Terminalia<sup>4</sup>, and I with the greatest pleasure; for it was full of kindness, of attention, and diligence. This therefore I will reply, as you desire; and I not follow my own arrangement, but the order which you have adopted. You say that you have recently got my letter from Cybistra, dated 22nd of September; and you wish to know the letters of yours I have received. Almost all you mention, except those which you say you by Lentulus' servant from Equotuticum and ndisium. So that your pains have not been wn away, as you apprehend; but have been irably laid out; provided it was your purpose to ratify me: for nothing gives me greater pleasure.

I am particularly glad that you approve of reserve towards Appius, and my freedom towards Brutus. I had thought it might have been otherwise. For Appius had written to me or three letters on his journey, complaining I had rescinded some of his regulations. As when a patient changes his physician, he that first in attendance should quarrel with his assessor for deviating from the treatment which he adopted. Just so Appius: having treated province by depletion, having let it bleed, and every sort of evacuation, and delivered it up quite exhausted, now does not like to see it treated under my care; but sometimes finds while at other times he returns thanks; for he avoided any personal reflection upon him. Dissimilarity alone of my conduct offends him. Indeed can be so dissimilar, as that the province under his government, should have been d with expenses and losses; and that from ne I have held it, there should have been no of a single penny, either privately or publicly say nothing of his prefects, his attendants, eutenants; his plunderings also, his licentiousness, and insults: whereas now there is no house managed with such prudence, such civility, such moderation, as the whole of my province. This some friends of Appius absurdly resent, as if I was studious of applause at sense; and did my duty not for the sake of a reputation, but of his discredit. But if I agreeably to Brutus's letter which I have sent you, expresses his thanks to me, I do not trouble myself about it: nevertheless, on the very day that I am writing before it is light, I think of abolishing many of his unjust acts and regulations. I come now to Brutus, whose interests I have embraced with the greatest warmth, at your desire; and for whom I had begun to entertain affection; but—shall I speak it? I check myself from fear of offending you. Do not, however, imagine that I have anything more at heart than to do as he directs; or that there is anything about which I have taken more pains. He gave me a list of instructions; and you had already conferred with me upon the same subjects; all of which I have prosecuted with the greatest diligence. In the first place, I have laboured to make Ariobarzanes pay him the talents he promised to give me. As long as the king remained with me, the transaction went on very well: afterwards he began to be pressed hard by a multitude of Pompeius's agents: and Pompeius has alone more authority than all other people; because, in addition to other reasons, it is thought he will come to the Parthian war. He is now paid by instalments of thirty-three Attic talents (6000*l*.) every month; and that is scarcely sufficient for the monthly interest. But our friend Cnæus<sup>5</sup> bears this patiently. He is without his principal; and is satisfied with the interest, though it is incomplete. Ariobarzanes pays nobody else, nor can he pay; for his treasury is exhausted, and he has no revenue. By Appius's ordinance, he demands tributes; but these hardly furnish the interest due to Pompeius. The king has two or three very rich friends; but they keep what belongs to them with as much care as I or you. On my part, however, I do not cease by letter, to entreat, to persuade, to upbraid the king. Deiotarus has, likewise, told me that he has sent messengers to him about Brutus's business; who brought him back word that the king has nothing. In truth, I believe nothing can be more plundered than that kingdom, nothing more indigent than the king: so that I think either of renouncing my wardship; or, like Scævola in the case of Glabrio, of refusing to pay the interest and charges upon his debts. However, to M. Scaptius<sup>6</sup> and L. Gavius, who managed Brutus's business in the kingdom, I have given the prefectures which I promised Brutus through you, as they did not trade within my province: for you remember my conditions, that he should take what prefectures he pleased, provided it was not for one engaged in traffic. I had, therefore, given him two besides. But the persons for whom he had asked had left the province. Now let me explain to you the affair of the Salaminians*, which I perceive is as new to you as it was to me: for I never understood from Brutus that the money belonged to him. Indeed I have his own memorandum, in which it is said, "The Salaminians owe money to M. Scaptius and P. Matinius, my intimate friends." These he recommends to me; and adds, as a sort of spur, that he was himself surety for them to a large amount. I had arranged that the Salaminians should repay it at twelve per cent. for six years, with an accruing interest at the end of each year. But Scaptius demanded forty-eight per cent. I was afraid, if he had obtained this, that you would yourself cease to love me. For I should have receded from my own proclamation; and should have utterly ruined a city placed under the protection of Cato, and of Brutus himself, and distinguished by my benefits". At this very time Scaptius suddenly produces a letter of Brutus, saying that the affair was at his own risk; which he had never mentioned either to me or you; and, at the same time, requesting that I would make Scaptius a prefect. But I had, through you, made this exception, that it must not be a person engaged in traffic. Or if I did appoint anybody, least of all could I appoint him; because he had been a prefect under Appius, and having some troops of horse, had actually besieged the senate in their house of assembly at Salamis, in consequence of which five senators had been starved to death. As soon as I received information of this from certain Cypriots, who were sent to meet me at Ephesus, I wrote the very day I reached the province, to remove the troops out of the island. On this account I imagine Scaptius must have written unfavourably of me to Brutus. This, however, is my feeling upon the subject: if Brutus should think that I ought to have awarded the forty-eight per cent., after having maintained the interest of twelve per cent. through the whole province, and declared it in my proclamation, and even had the concurrence of the severest usurers; or if he should complain of my refusing a prefecture to one engaged in trade, which I have refused to Torquatus, in the case of your friend Lenius, and to Pompeius himself, in the case of Sex. Statius, and have received their approbation of my conduct; or if he should be offended at my withdrawing the troops; I shall be sorry indeed to have incurred his displeasure, but much more so to find him a different man from what I had supposed. This, however, Scaptius must acknowledge, that he was enabled to receive all the money according to the terms of my decree. I may add, too, what I doubt if you will yourself approve: for the interest ought to have stood as it was in the decree; and the Salaminians wished accordingly to deposit it<sup>a</sup>; but I prevailed upon them to forbear. They gave way to me indeed; but what is to become of them if Paullus should succeed to the province? All this I did for Brutus' sake, who has written to you very kindly about me: but to me, even when he is asking a favour, he writes in a dogmatical, haughty, uncivil manner. I wish you would write to him upon these matters, that I may know how he takes it: for you will inform me. I had indeed particularly mentioned this subject to you in a former letter<sup>b</sup>; but I would have you distinctly understand that I had not forgot what you said in some of your letters, that if I brought back from this province nothing else besides his favour, it was sufficient. Be it so, since you desire it: but with this condition I presume that I incur no guilt. Accordingly I decreed the payment of Scaptius's debt without delay. How properly the decree was formed I leave you to judge. I shall not appeal even to Cato. But do not suppose I have thrown aside your exhortations, which are imprinted in my bosom. With tears in your eyes you commended to me my reputation. What letter of yours is there in which you do not advert to it? Let then who will be angry; I shall be content with having right on my side; especially as I have bound myself by six books<sup>c</sup>, as it were so many pledges, with which I am rejoiced to find you so well pleased. In these you doubt about one historical fact, relating to Cnæus the son of M. Flavius. But he did not live before the time of the decemviri: for he was curule-sædile; which was an office instituted many years after the decemviri. What then was the use of his publishing the table of the festivals? It is supposed to have been at some time concealed, with the view of making it necessary to consult the few upon the proper days for transacting business. And many authors assert, that Cn. Flavius the scribe published the list of festivals, and composed the formularies of legal process; that you may not suppose it to be my invention, or, rather that of Africanus, for it is he that speaks. What is said about the gesture of a player has not escaped you. You entertain a wicked suspicion<sup>d</sup>; I wrote it in perfect simplicity. You say that you heard of my being saluted imperator through Philotimus. But I take for granted, since you have been in Epirus, you have received from me two letters, with a full account of everything; one from Pindenissus presently after its capture, the other from Laodiceæ, both delivered to your servants. Upon the same subject I sent public despatches to Rome by two different messengers, for fear of the accidents of sea voyage. About my daughter Tullia I agree with you; and have written to her, and to Terentia, to express my concurrence. For you had before said—"and I could wish you had gone back to your own flock<sup>e</sup>." The correction of the letter brought by Memmius was a matter of no difficulty: for I greatly prefer him from Postidius<sup>f</sup> to the other from Servilia: therefore you may get the assistance of Aufius, who has always been very friendly to me; and now may be expected to be still more so, as he ought to succeed to his brother Appius's<sup>g</sup> affection towards me, along with the

of his inheritance. He often declared how he esteemed me; and showed it in the affair larsa<sup>4</sup>. You will relieve me from a great source anxiety<sup>5</sup>. I am not pleased with Furnius's pious<sup>6</sup>; for the only time that I dread is the which he excepts. I should write more to upon this subject if you were at Rome. I am surprised that you place all hope of peace in peius. So it is: and I think that the charge of mutilation<sup>7</sup> must be removed. If the arrangement of my letter is confused, you must attribute it yourself; for I follow you in your sudden notions. The young Ciceros are attached to other, and pursue their studies and exercises; but, as Isocrates said of Ephorus and pompus<sup>8</sup>, one wants a bridle, the other a spur. I am to present Quintus with his gown<sup>9</sup> of man on the festival of Bacchus (March 18), as rather desired. I shall observe the day, on resumption of there being no intercalation. I am very much pleased with Dionysius. The say that he is very passionate; but there can be body of more learning, or better morals, or attached to you and me. It is with justice that you hear the commendations of Thermus and that they conduct themselves most honourably. I also M. Nonius, Bibulus, me, if you will. I Scrofa had an opportunity of distinguishing himself; for it is a situation of splendour<sup>10</sup>. The discredit the administration of Cato. I am obliged to you for having recommended me<sup>11</sup> to Hortensius. Dionysius thinks there is hope about Amianus. I have been able to trace of Terentius. Mæragenes<sup>12</sup> must be dead. I have passed through his prison which there was not a living creature in. I did not know this at the time I wrote to your freed-man Democritus. I have seen the Rhosiac vases. But, pray what are you making of? In wrought dishes and splendid you use to entertain me with a dinner of what then can I suppose you will serve up henceforward? Directions have been given to out a horn for Phemius<sup>13</sup>: it will no doubt be found. I trust he will perform something worthy of it. We are threatened with a Parthian war. Cassius has sent a foolish letter<sup>14</sup>. Bibulus's has not yet been received; when it is read, I imagine the senate will at length be roused. For my own part, I am in great perplexity. If, as I hope, the term of my service is not extended, I have still fears about June and July. Yet, suppose any irruption to be made, Bibulus will surely be able to hold out for two months. But what will be the situation of him whom I leave there; especially if it be my brother? or what will be my own, if I do not take my departure so soon? This is a great difficulty. I have, however, agreed with Deiotarus, that he is to join my camp with all his forces. He has thirty cohorts of 400 men each, armed in our manner; and 2000 horse. He will support us till Pompeius arrives; who, by the letters I have received from him, gives me to understand that the business will be left to him. The Parthians have taken up their winter quarters in the Roman province<sup>15</sup>. Orodes himself is expected. In short, there is some stir. I have made no deviation from Bibulus's proclamation, besides that exception about which you wrote to me, as containing a reflection upon our order<sup>16</sup>. I have adopted what is equivalent, but more guarded, from the Asiatic proclamation of Q. Mucius, son to Publius, "that covenants should be performed with good faith, excepting when the transaction was of such a nature that it could not properly be observed." I have also followed many parts of Scævola's; among the rest, that which the Greeks consider as the restoration of their freedom; that, in settling their disputes with each other, they should use their own laws. The proclamation is a short one, because of my having divided it under two distinct heads: one of them provincial; in which is contained what relates to the public accounts of the cities, to debts, interest of money, contracts, likewise all the concerns of the public renters: the other embraces what could not conveniently be determined without a proclamation, the entering upon inheritances and property, the appointment of commissioners and sales of effects; which are usually demanded and executed under a decree of the governor. A third head, concerning the determination of all other causes, I left unwritten, professing to regulate my decrees of this sort by those of Rome. Thus I endeavour, and hitherto succeed in giving general satisfaction. The Greeks are delighted with having judges of their own nation. Poor ones, you will say. What does it signify? at least they think they have obtained their freedom by it. For your people<sup>17</sup> truly have dignified judges in the persons of Turpio the cobbler, and Vettius the broker. You wish to know what I mean to do with the renters. I make much of them, I humour them, I commend them in words, and pay them honours; but take care they shall not be vexatious to anybody. What is most extraordinary, even Servilius abided by the interest of money, as it had been ratified in their contracts. But I manage thus: I appoint a day at a considerable distance, before which if they pay what is due, I give notice that I shall estimate the interest at twelve per cent.; but if they do not pay, then I leave them to their contract. By these means both the Greeks pay at a reasonable interest, and the renters get an arrangement which is very acceptable. Such is the present state of things; they have verbal honour in full measure, and frequent invitations. In short, they are all so well with me, that everybody thinks himself to be the most so. But withal, "there is nothing"—you know the rest. About the statue of Africanus (how unconnected the subjects! but this very circumstance delights me in your letter;) what say you? Does not this Scipio Metellus know that his own ancestor was never censor? Yet on the statue, which you had placed in that elevated situation in the temple of Ops, there was inscribed nothing but "Consul." Likewise on that which is in the temple of Pollux there is inscribed "Consul:" and, that it was of this same Africanus, the attitude, the dress, the ring, the likeness itself declares: in fact, when in that crowd of gilt knights, which this Metellus placed in the capitol, I observed the statue of Africanus with the inscription of Serapion, I supposed it to be an error of the workman; but now I see it was Metellus's. What a disgraceful ignorance! Respecting Flavius, and the festivals, if it is a mistake, at least it is a general one; and you have very properly doubted; and I was near following the common opinion; as is done in many of the circumstances related by the Greek historians. For who has not asserted that the Enpolis of the ancient comedy was thrown into the sea by Alcibiades as he was sailing to Sicily? Yet Eratosthenes has confuted it, by adducing plays which he wrote after that time. But is Duris of Samos, therefore, an historian of great research, to be reviled because he has made the same mistake as many others? Who has not said that Zaleucus composed laws for the Locrians? And is Theophrastus then to be scorned, because the circumstance is contradicted by your favourite Timæus? But not to know that his own ancestor had not been censor, is disgraceful: especially as, during the remainder of his life after his consulship, no Cornelius whatever had been censor. As to what you say of Philotimus, and the payment of the 20,600 sesterii (165*l.*), I understand that Philotimus came to the Chersonesus<sup>a</sup> about the beginning of January; but I have yet received nothing from him. Camillus sends me word that he has received the residue which belonged to me; what that is I know not, and should be glad to know. But of these matters hereafter. Perhaps they can best be settled when we meet. One thing, my Atticus, towards the conclusion of your letter disturbed me: for you write thus—"What more?" Then you go on to entreat me in the most friendly manner, "not to relax in my vigilance, and to take care what is done." Have you then heard anything wrong of anybody? Though assuredly there is nothing of the kind; far from it. For it would not have escaped me, nor will it. Yet that admonition of yours, so particular, seems to indicate something.

<sup>a</sup> In the original there are only two Greek words, the beginning of some sentence familiar to Atticus, but not known at this time; of course the sense is matter of conjecture, in which state I have thought it best to leave it.

Respecting M. Octavius, I now reply to you a second time, that you have given him<sup>x</sup> a very proper answer. I wish you had done it a little more confidently. For Cælius sent his freed-man to me with a very civil letter; but spoke of the panthers, and of the cities<sup>y</sup>, most foully. I wrote word back that, in the first place, I was sorry I should be so little known in this obscurity, as to have it yet unheard in Rome that no expenses were imposed upon the people of my province, but for the payment of debts: and I informed him that it was neither lawful for me to procure the money he wanted, nor for him to receive it: and I admonished him, whom I really love, that having been himself the accuser of others, he should conduct himself more cautiously. In the next place, I gave him to understand that it was inconsistent with my honour, to make the Cythrians have a public hunting by my command. Lepa is in raptures with your letter; for it is beautifully written, and has put me in high favour with him. I am much obliged to your daughter for having expressly desired you to send me her good wishes: I am obliged to Folia also: but the former has been more forward in her kindness, by greeting me, whom she has yet never seen. Do you, therefore, in return make my compliments to both of them. A passage of your letter dated the 31st of December contained a grateful recollection of the celebrated oath<sup>z</sup>, which I had not forgotten: for on that day I was great in my robe of honour. You have my reply to all the subjects of your letters; not, as you ask me, gold for brass<sup>a</sup>; but like for like. But there is another little letter, which I must not leave unanswered. Luccius might indeed very well give up his Tusculanum<sup>b</sup>; unless, perhaps, that he likes to retire there with his piper. I should be glad to know what is the real state of his affairs. I hear, too, that our friend Lentulus has offered for sale his Tusculanum on account of his debts. I wish to see them both free; and likewise Sestius, and add, if you please, Cælius: to all of whom may be applied that verse of Homer, "They were ashamed to refuse, and afraid to accept<sup>c</sup>." I imagine you have heard of Curio's intention of proposing the recall of Memmius. About the security of Egnatius Sidicius<sup>d</sup>, I have yet some hope, though not much. Pnarius, whom you commend to me, is very well; but Deiotarus takes great care of him in his sickness. I have now replied also to your little letter. I hope you will let me frequently hear from you

<sup>z</sup> When upon resigning the consulship on the 31st of December, Cicero having been invidiously forbid to harangue the people, adroitly altered the usual oath, and instead of swearing that he had faithfully discharged his duty, he swore that the republic and city of Rome had been saved by his means.

while I remain at Laodicea, that is, till the 15th of May; and when you come to Athens (for by that time we shall know about the city business, and about the provinces, which are all deferred to the month of March), send me a special messenger. It is it true that you have, through Herodes, ready got from Cæsar fifty Attic talents (9000*l*.)? which, as I hear, you have greatly incurred the pleasure of Pompeius; for he thinks you have vowed what belonged to him; and that Cæsar will become the more active in building at the vote. I heard this from P. Veditius, a great edigal, but well acquainted with Pompeius. Veditius met me with two light carriages, and a very one suitably equipped, and a litter, and a driver at retinue; for which, if Curio's law should be passed, he will be obliged to pay a hundred tertia (800*l*.). He had besides a dog-headed key in the carriage, and some wild asses. I never saw a more extravagant fellow. But hear my conclusion. He lodged at Laodicea with Pomponius Vindullus, and there he left his equipage when he came to me. Presently Vindullus dies, and the event it is thought will concern Pompeius greatly. C. Vennonius comes to Vindullus's house; and as he was sealing the effects, he lights on the things belonging to Veditius. Among them were found five laguncule<sup>b</sup> of married women, of the sister of a friend of yours, a brutish<sup>c</sup>, who associates with him, and wife of that very Lepidus, who bears these things so carelessly. I wished to send you this history by the messenger for we are both of us very curious. There is nothing besides I would have you consider. I told that Appianus is erecting a portico at Laodicea. Should I be foolish, if I were to erect at the Academy? I think so, you will say. You must give it me in writing. I am very fond of Athens, and should like to leave some memorial, while I hate false inscriptions on other men's statues. But as it shall please you. You also inform me on what day the Roman year falls<sup>d</sup>; and how you pass the winter. Take care of your health. The seven hundred and sixty-fourth day after the battle of Leuctra<sup>e</sup>.

From the name of Pompeius prefixed to Vindullus, it is probable that the latter might be a freed-man of Pompeius; in which case, if he died intestate and without heirs, Pompeius would succeed to one half of his property.

Pliny has left the Latin word as it stands in Grævius's edition, without attempting to suggest either an alteration or a translation. Whatever be its proper signification, as an image, as some have supposed, or some article of furniture, it seems at least to have contained an image, name, by which its owner might be known. A striking expression for Brutus, admissible only in the relation of friendship. The word Lepidus is afterwards used in a similar manner.

The Academy at Athens, the original seat of that philosophy which Cicero followed. As before observed, that previously to Cæsar's reformation of the calendar, the year was regulated by the motion of more or fewer days between the 23d and 24th of February, at the discretion of the pontiff; and was proclaimed, the time of the subsequent festival not known.

is, after the memorable affray in which Clodius was slain, and which Cicero humorously compares to the battle of Leuctra, famous in Grecian history.

LETTER II.

YOUR freed-man, Philogenes, having called to pay his respects to me at Laodicea, saying that he was going to cross the sea to you immediately, I send this letter by him in answer to that which I received through Brutus's courier; and I shall reply first to your last page, which has given me great uneasiness, owing to what Cincius has written about Statius's conversation, in which it is very vexatious that Statius should say I approved that design. I approve it! Upon this subject, I have only to say, that it is my wish to have as many bonds of connexion with you as possible,—though the strongest of all are still those of affection; so far am I from wishing to loosen any of those by which we are united. But that he is apt to speak too harshly about these matters I have often experienced, and have often appeased his anger, as I believe you know. And in this excursion or campaign of mine, I have repeatedly seen him inflamed with rage and calmed again. What he may have written to Statius, I know not. But, whatever he meant to do in an affair of that kind, at least he ought not to have detailed it to his freed-man. I will, however, use my utmost endeavours that nothing may be done contrary to your wishes, and to his duty; for it is not enough in such a case, for every one merely to attend to his own conduct. The boy, or now the young man, Cicero, has especially his part in this duty; of which, indeed, I often remind him: and he seems to me to bear great affection, as he ought, towards his mother, and remarkably so towards you. He is a boy of good parts, but unsteady; in regulating which I have enough to do. Having now in my first page answered your last, I shall return to the beginning of your letter. In applying the term maritime<sup>a</sup> to all the cities of the Peloponnesus, I have followed the synopsis of Dicaearchus, no inconsiderable author, but one approved even by your judgment. In relating Chæron's<sup>b</sup> account of Trophonius's cave, he finds great fault with the Greeks for having so adhered to the sea-coast, and does not accept any place in the Peloponnesus. Though I was pleased with the author, (for he was well versed in history, and had lived in the Peloponnesus,) yet I was surprised; and communicated my doubts to Dionysius. He was at first struck with it; but having as good an opinion of Dicaearchus, as you can have of C. Vestorius, or I of M. Cluvius, he thought I might safely trust him. He reckoned a certain place called Leprium to be a maritime town of Arcadia; and considered Tene and Aliphera and Tritia as recently built, which he confirmed by Homer's catalogue of the ships, in which there is no mention made of them. And I transcribed that passage from Dicaearchus in so many words. I knew that the Philisians were so called; and would have you put it in your copy: I have it so. But at first I was misled by analogy; Phlius, Opus, Sipus, from whence are derived Opuntii, Sipuntii;

but I presently corrected it. I understand you are pleased with my moderation and forbearance. You would be more so if you were here. In this court, which I hold at Laodicea from the middle of February to the end of April for all the departments except Cilicia, I have been able to effect wonders; so many cities have been set free from all debt, so many greatly relieved, and all, by being allowed to use their own laws and judicature, have revived as if they had gained their freedom. There are two ways by which I have enabled them to discharge, or at least to diminish, their debts. One, by putting them to no expense within my government: when I say none, I am not speaking hyperbolically, but mean literally none, not a farthing. From this alone it is incredible how the cities have been relieved. Another was, that there were surprising impositions practised by the Greeks themselves, in the persons of their magistrates. I instituted an inquiry myself, respecting those who had held magistracies within the last ten years, and they openly confessed. Therefore, without any public disgrace, they were left to restore to the people their money. And the people, who in this present lustrum<sup>1</sup> had paid nothing, have without murmuring discharged even what was due of the lustrum preceding. So that I am in favour with the renters; a grateful set of people, you will say. I am sensible of it. The rest of my administration has been mild and courteous, and not inconsiderate. The access to me has been by no means such as is usual in the provincial governments. There has been no intriguing with the chamberlain. I am up and walking before it is light, as I used to do when I was a candidate. This is great, and well received; and is not laborious to me, from the habit of that ancient service. On the 7th of May I think of going into Cilicia; and after spending the month of June there (I wish it may be in peace, for we are threatened with a great war from the Parthians,) to employ July on my return. For my year of office expires the 30th of July, and I am in great hope that no extension of the time will be made. I have the city registers to the 7th of March, by which I find that, by the perseverance of my friend Curio, everything is likely to be passed rather than the business of the provinces<sup>2</sup>. I hope, therefore, that I shall very soon see you. I come now to your friend, nay, my friend Brutus, for so you will have it. I have done everything that I could do in my province, or that I could attempt in the kingdom<sup>3</sup>. I have exerted myself with the king in every way, and continue to do so daily by letter. For I had him three or four days with me in a disturbed state of his affairs, from which I have extricated him. And both personally, and afterwards by reiterated letters, I have not ceased to beg and entreat him for my sake, and to advise and persuade him for his own. I have been able to do a good deal; but how much I do not exactly know, owing to my great distance from him. The Salaminians, however, (for these I could force,) I have brought to express their readiness to pay the whole account to Scaptius, on condition of paying interest at twelve per cent. reckoned from the last contract, and not merely twelve per cent. throughout, but with the interest added to the principal at the end of each year. The money was paid down; but Scaptius refused to take it. And do you say then that Brutus is content to sustain some loss? It was forty-eight per cent. in the contract. The thing was impossible; nor if it had been possible could I have suffered it. I hear now that Scaptius repents. For what he affirmed to be by a decree of the senate, that the contract should be good in law, was done from this consideration, that the Salaminians had raised money contrary to the Gabinian law. For the law of Aulus Gabinus forbids the cognizance of such bonds. The senate therefore decreed, that the bond should be cognizable. It consequently possesses just the same authority as others, and nothing more. This statement of what has passed, I think Brutus himself must approve. How you<sup>4</sup> may approve it I cannot say; Cato certainly will. But to return to you; can you, my Atticus, who praise so highly my integrity and politeness, can you from your own mouth, as Ennius says, ask me to send troops to Scaptius, for the purpose of extortion? Would you if you were with me, who sometimes say that you are vexed at not being so, would you suffer me to do it if I wished it? "Not more," you say, "than fifty men." There were at first not so many with Spartacus<sup>5</sup>. And what mischief would they not have done in so exposed an island? But would they not have done it? Nay, what did they not do before my arrival? They kept the senate of the Salaminians shut up in their meeting-room so many days, that some of them perished with hunger. For Scaptius was a prefect under Appian, and had some troops from him. Do you then, whose image is presented to my mind as often as I think of anything honourable and praiseworthy,—do you, I say, ask me to make Scaptius a prefect? I had formerly made a resolution to appoint nobody engaged in traffic, and Brutus approved of it. Should he have cavalry? why rather than infantry? Scaptius I suppose is grown prodigal of his money. The principal people you say wish it. I know how much they wish it: for they came as far as Ephesus to meet me, and with tears related the infamous conduct of the cavalry, and their own miseries. In consequence, I immediately despatched letters to have the troops removed from Cyprus before a certain day; and for this, among other reasons, the Salaminians applaud me to the skies in their decrees. But what need of troops now? For the Salaminians already pay,—unless indeed I wished to compel them by force of arms to reckon the interest at forty-eight per cent. And if I were to do such a thing, should I ever dare to read or look into those books<sup>6</sup> which you commend? In this business, my sweet Atticus, you have shown too much, yes, too much regard to Brutus: I fear I may have shown too little. I have acknowledged, in a letter to Brutus, that you mentioned these particulars to me. Now let me turn to something else. I shall here do all I can for Appian<sup>7</sup>, con-

<sup>2</sup> If no new regulation were made, Cicero's government would of course terminate with the year for which he was appointed.

LETTER III.

HOWEVER I have no news to tell you of anything that has happened since I wrote to you by your amanuensis Philogenes, yet as I am going to send Atticus to Rome, I will not let him go without a few lines to you; and first, what particularly concerns me, (not that you can at all help me, for business does not admit of delay, and you are going away off, and, as it is said, "the wind rolls up waves of the wide sea between us") the day you see creeps on; for I leave the province the end of July, and there is yet no successor appointed. Whom shall I leave to take the command of the province? Reason and general expectation for my brother; in the first place, because he is esteemed an honour, and therefore nobody is proper; in the next place, because he is the person I have of prætorian rank. For Pontius, by the terms of his agreement, (having come upon that condition,) has already left me. No thanks my questor<sup>4</sup> of sufficient dignity,—he is voluble, licentious, and touchy. But regard to my brother, the first consideration is that I imagine he would not easily be prevailed on if he dislikes the province, and in truth he can be more disagreeable or more troublesome.

Then, supposing he should not choose to me, what ought I to do? For, at a time here is thought to be a great war in Syria, at likely to force its way into this province, here is here no defence, and supplies voted for the year that is expiring,—what affection argue to leave my brother? or what attend my duty to leave a mere trifler? You see, dear, under what difficulties I labour, and how I stand in need of advice. In short, I did not have anything to do with this whole affair. How much preferable is your province<sup>5</sup>! I leave it when you please, (unless perhaps you have left it already,) and you may appoint Messoprotia and Chaonia whomsoever you think fit. However, I have not yet seen Quintus, to know whether, if I wished it, he could be brought to agree to it; nor, if he could, am I sure what I should wish. So much then for this. The rest is hitherto full of praise and thanks, and not unworthy of those books which you are pleased to commend. Cities have been preserved; the renters have been abundantly satisfied; nobody has been hurt by any insult, very few by the severe justice of my decrees, and nobody so that he dare complain. Deeds have been accomplished that would justify a triumph; about which I shall do nothing in a hurry, and nothing at all without your advice. The only difficulty is in delivering up the province; and this some god must determine. Respecting the affairs of the city, you know more than I; you have more frequent and more certain intelligence. Indeed I am concerned that I should not myself have received information from your letters, for there were unpleasant reports here about Curio and Paullus<sup>6</sup>. Not that I apprehend any danger while Pompeius stands or even sits<sup>7</sup> by us; let him but have his health. But yet I lament the condition of Curio and Paullus, with whom I am well acquainted. If therefore you are now in Rome, or whenever you are there, I should wish you to send me a sketch of the whole state, which may meet me, and by which I may fashion myself, and consider beforehand in what disposition of mind I should approach the city. For it is something not to be quite a stranger and uninformed upon my arrival. I had almost forgot to add, that for your friend Brutus' sake, as I have repeatedly written to you, I have done everything I could. The Cypriots paid down the money, but Scaptius was not satisfied with the interest of twelve per cent. accumulating at the end of each year. Pompeius has not been able to get more from Ariobarzanes through his own influence, than Brutus has got through mine, though it was impossible for me to ensure him. For the king was very poor; and I was so far off that I could only act by letters, with which I have not ceased to press him. The result is, that in proportion to the amount, Brutus comes off better than Pompeius: for about one hundred talents (20,000*l.*) have been procured for Brutus in the course of the year; and in six months two hundred (40,000*l.*) have been promised to Pompeius. But in the affair of Appius, it can hardly be told what consideration I have had for Brutus. Why then should I vex myself? His friends are mere trifles, Matinius, and Scaptius; who because he could not get from me a troop of horse to harass the Cypriots, as he had done before, is perhaps angry; or because he is not a prefect, which I have granted to nobody engaged in traffic; not to C. Vennonius, my own familiar acquaintance; nor to yours, M. Lenius. This I told you in Rome that I meant to observe; and I have persevered in it. But what reason can he have to complain, who refused to take the money when it was offered him? The other Scaptius who was in Cappadocia is, I imagine, satisfied. Upon receiving from me the appointment of tribune, which I offered him at the request of Brutus, he afterwards wrote to me to say that he did not wish to accept it. There is a person by the name of Gavius, whom I also made prefect, by Brutus's desire; but he thought fit to say and to do many things against me, mixed with abuse,—a very spaniel of P. Clodius. This fellow neither escorted me on my way to Apamea; nor afterwards, when he had come to the camp and was returning again, did he ask if I had any commands; and he was, I know not why, manifestly unfriendly. If I had employed such a man as prefect, what would you think of me? I, who as you know could never bear the insolence of the most powerful men, should I bear it in this hireling? though it is something more than bearing it, to bestow a place of emolument and honour. This Gavius then, seeing me lately at Apamea on his way to Rome, addressed me thus: (I should hardly venture to address Culleolus<sup>1</sup> in such a manner:) "Whence," says he, "am I to get my allowances as prefect?" I replied, with more gentleness than those who were present thought I ought to have done, "that I was not used to give allowances to those whose services were not wanted." He went away in a passion. If Brutus can be moved with the anger of such a worthless fellow, you may love him by yourself, I shall not be your rival. But I think Brutus will show himself to be what he ought. I wished however that you might be acquainted with the real state of the case; and I have sent an exact account of it to Brutus himself. Between ourselves, Brutus positively sends me no letters, not even lately about Appius, in which there is not something haughty and unfriendly. It is a saying often in your mouth, that "Granius did not undervalue himself, and hated proud kings<sup>1</sup>;" in which however he rather excites my smile than my anger; but he is in truth too regardless of what he writes or to whom. Q. Cicero the son has I suppose, nay, certainly, read the letter addressed to his father. For he is in the habit of opening them, and that by my advice, in case there should be anything of importance to be known. In that letter was the same notice about your sister which you mentioned to me. I saw the young man wonderfully moved, and he uttered his grief to me in tears. In short, I observed a great degree of filial affection, of sweetness, and kindness; from which I entertain the greater hope that nothing will be done hastily<sup>1</sup>. This I wished you to be acquainted with. I am sorry to add that young Hortensius has been conducting himself in a very unbecoming and disgraceful manner at the exhibition of gladiators at Laodicea. I invited him to dinner for his father's sake the day he arrived; and for the same father's sake I have done nothing more<sup>2</sup>. He told me that he should wait for me at Athens, that we might return home together. "Very well," said I; for what could I say? In fact I imagine what he said is nothing at all. I should certainly be sorry from fear of offending the father, for whom I have a great regard. If he should go with me, I will so manage him as not to give offence where I should be very sorry, to do it. I have nothing more to say, but that I should be glad if you would send me Q. Celer's speech against M. Servilius. Let me hear from you soon. If there is no news, at least let me hear by your messenger that there is none. My regards to Pilia and your daughter. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

I ARRIVED at Tarsus the 5th of June, where I met with several things which gave me uneasiness. There is a great war in Syria, great depredations in Cilicia, and any plan of administration is rendered difficult by reason of the short time that remains of my yearly office. But above all, my greatest difficulty is, that I am obliged by the decree of the senate to leave somebody in charge of the government. Nothing could be more unfit than the quaestor Mescinius<sup>1</sup>; and of Caelius<sup>2</sup> I yet hear nothing. It seems most proper to leave my brother with the command; but in this there are some unpleasant circumstances, such as my own departure, the danger of a war, the irregularities of the soldiers, and six hundred things besides. How hateful is the whole business! But this I must leave to fortune, since there is little opportunity for the exercise of prudence. When you are come safely, as I hope, to Rome, you will with your accustomed kindness see about everything which you think concerns me; and, in the first place, about my dear Tullia, respecting whose establishment I have written my opinion to Terentia, while you were in Greece. The next thing to be considered is my honour. For in your absence I fear there has hardly been sufficient attention paid in the senate to my letters. I shall besides write a few words to you more mysteriously, which your sagacity will be able to unravel. My wife's freed-man (you know whom I mean<sup>3</sup>) has seemed to me lately, by what he has incautiously let out, to have confused the calculations arising from the sale of the goods of the Crotonian tyrannicide<sup>4</sup>. And I fear—Do you understand me? Looking then yourself alone into this, secure the residue<sup>5</sup>. I cannot write all that I fear. Contrive that your letters may fly to meet me. I have written this hastily on my journey, and surrounded by troops. You will make my compliments to Pilia, and to the pretty little Cæcilia<sup>6</sup>.

LETTER V.

By this time I presume you are in Rome, where, it is so, I congratulate you upon your safe arrival. As long as you were away, you seemed to be further from me than if you were at home, for was more a stranger to the state, both of the public affairs, and of my own. Therefore, although I hope that I shall already have made some progress on my way by the time you read this, yet I could wish you to let me hear frequently from you, with every particular, upon all subjects; especially upon what I before mentioned to you, that your wife's freed-man has appeared to me, by his frequent hesitation and shuffling, in different meetings and conversations, to have admitted some correctness into his computation of the Crotonian's property. Be so good as to inquire into this through your usual kindness, but especially this: From the walls of the city on the seven hills he delivered to Camillus* an account of debts to the amount of 24 and 48 minæ (76*l*. and 153*l*.); that he owed 24 minæ from the Crotonian property; 1 from that of the Chersonesus† 48 minæ; and having entered upon a succession of 1280 minæ (96*l*.), he had not paid a farthing, though the time was due the first of February: his own freed-man, a namesake of Conon's father‡, had been wholly inattentive." In the first place, therefore, I care that the principal may be all secured; and, that the interest from the fore-mentioned day is not be overlooked. I had great fears whilst I desired him to be here; for he came to make obligations, not without some hopes. But failing in this, he went away abruptly, saying, "I give up;" at the same time quoting a verse of Homer, that it is incredible to remain long and return empty". I be reproached me with the old saying, "What ven," &c". See after the residue"; and as far as possible let me clearly understand it. Though we now almost served my yearly term, for there only thirty-three days remaining, yet I am still harassed by the anxious state of the province. For while Syria is blazing with arms, and thus in the midst of his sad affliction§ sustains chief burden of the war; and his lieutenants, quæstor, and friends, are sending to me to come for assistance; though my army is but weak, yet, as good auxiliaries of the Galatians, Pisidians, Lydians, which constitute its strength, I have thought it my duty to keep them as near as possible to the enemy, so long as the decree of the senate advises me to preside over the province. But, it gives me great satisfaction, Bibulus is not fortunate with me, but rather writes to inform me of everything. In the mean time the day of my torture creeps on unobserved. As soon as it arrives, it will be another question whom I shall leave in the command; unless Calvus Cælius, the new quæstor, should be come, of whom I have yet heard nothing certain. I intended to have written a longer letter, but I have nothing more to say, and am too full of care to trifle and joke. Farewell, therefore, and make my compliments to the dear little Attica, and to my friend Pilia.

LETTER VI.

(Græc. vii.)

YOUNG Quintus has, with all duty, reconciled the mind of his father to your sister. It is true that I encouraged him, but when he was already in his course. Your letter, too, was a great incitement. In short, I trust the affair will terminate as we wish. I have already written to you two letters about my private concerns, if only they have been delivered. They were in Greek, and in purposed ambiguity. But there is no occasion to do anything, besides simply asking about Milo's account, and exhorting him to use despatch as he promised me: you may thus be of some service. I have desired the quæstor Mescinius to wait at Laodicea, that I may get the accounts made out agreeably to the Julian law, and left in two of the provincial cities. I design to go to Rhodes for the sake of the boys, and thence as soon as possible to Athens, though the winds are very much against us; but I want to reach home during the year of the present magistrates, whose good-will I have experienced in the decree for a supplication*. But let me hear from you on my way, whether you think I ought to take more time, out of respect to the republic. I should have written by Tiro, but have left him very ill at Issus. They send me word, however, that he is better; but I am much concerned for him. For nothing can be more modest, or more attentive, than that young man.

LETTER VII.

(Græc. vi.)

WHILST in everything I support Appian's honour in the province, I am on a sudden become father-in-law to his accuser". "May it turn out happily!" you say. I hope it may, and I am sure that you wish it. But, believe me, I thought of nothing less, and had sent some confidential persons to the ladies about Tiberius Nero, who had applied to me on the subject. When they came to Rome the contract was already made. I hope this may be a more desirable party. I understand the ladies are exceedingly delighted with the young man's courtesy and complaisance. You must not try to pick out defects. But how is this? Do you distribute bread to the populace at Athens? Do you think this right? Though my treatise<sup>b</sup> does not forbid it; for this is no bribe amongst fellow-citizens, but a liberal acknowledgment of hospitality. You still advise me to think of the portico for the Academy<sup>c</sup>, though Appius no longer thinks of that at Eleusis. I am sure you must be sorry for Hortensius<sup>d</sup>. I am myself deeply concerned; for I had looked forwards to living with him in great familiarity. I have appointed Cælius to the charge of the province. "A mere boy," you will say, "and perhaps giddy, and undignified, and intemperate." I acknowledge it, but it could not be otherwise; for I was struck with the letter I had received from you some time since, in which you said that you doubted what I ought to do about resigning the command. I saw what was the cause of your doubt, and was sensible of the difficulty; that I was delivering it to a boy: but it was not desirable to deliver it to my brother; and, besides my brother, there was nobody whom I could with propriety advance before the questor, especially as he was a person of noble birth. However, so long as the Parthians seemed to threaten us, I had determined either to leave my brother in the command, or even, for the sake of the republic, to remain myself, contrary to the decree of the senate. But since by a most unexpected good fortune they have retired, my doubt has been removed. I foresaw what would be said: "So, has he resigned to his brother? Is this holding the government for not more than a year? What avails it that the senate wished the provinces to devolve upon such as had not before had a command; while this<sup>e</sup> man has commanded for three years together?" This then is what I say in public<sup>f</sup>. But what shall I say to you? I should never be free from anxiety, lest he should do something angrily, or disrespectfully, or carelessly, for such is the condition of mankind. What if his son should be guilty of some imprudence, a boy of great self-confidence? What vexation would it give me! For his father would not send him away, and was not pleased that you should advise it. But as for Cælius, I do not say that I care not what he does; but however I care much less. Add to this, that Pompeius, a man of that weight and experience, appointed Q. Cassius; and Cæsar, Antonius, without the form of a ballot; should I offend one who is given me by ballot? and thereby induce him to pry into the conduct of the person whom I had left? What I have done is preferable, and is warranted by many precedents, and is more suited to my age<sup>h</sup>. But, ye gods! in what favour have I put you with him, by reading to him, I do not say your letter, but that of your secretary. The letters of my friends invite me to demand a triumph, a thing, as I think, not to be despised in this regeneration<sup>i</sup> of my fortunes. Therefore, my Atticus, do you also begin to wish it, that I may not be discountenanced.

LETTER VIII.

As I was going to write to you, and had actually taken up my pen, Batonius came directly from the ship to the house in which I was at Ephesus, and delivered to me your letter of September 30. I rejoice at your favourable passage, your meeting with Pilia, and, not least, at her conversation about the marriage of my daughter Tullia. But Batonius has brought me strange alarms respecting Cæsar: to Lepta he has spoken yet more at large. I hope his news may not be true; it is certainly dreadful: that he will on no account dismiss his army; and that the prætors elect, and Cassius the tribune of the people, and the consul Lentulus, support him, while Pompeius thinks of retiring from the city. But how is this? Are you at all troubled for him, who sets himself before the uncle of your sister's son<sup>j</sup>? And who are they that have defeated him? But to my purpose. The Etesian winds have greatly retarded me; and this undecked vessel of the Rhodians has made me lose twenty days. Whilst I am on the point of embarking from Ephesus, I deliver this letter to L. Tarquinius, who leaves the port at the same time, but will sail quicker. For in these open vessels, and other long boats of the Rhodians, we must watch for fair weather. I have, however, made as much haste as I could. I am pleased with what you say of the Puteolan crumbs<sup>k</sup>. Now I should wish you carefully to consider the state of the Roman affairs, and see what you think should be determined about demanding a triumph, to which my friends invite me. I should be quite easy about it, if Bibulus was not trying for it; who, as long as there was one enemy in Syria, no more put his foot out of the gate than he had formerly done out of his house<sup>l</sup>. But now it is disgraceful to be silent. However, consider the whole matter, that as soon such as might be excited against him, if he offended his questor.

<sup>c</sup> Having begun, as it were, a new life, after his restoration from banishment, a life which required the support of new honours: for, before that event, the fame of his consulship had been such, as to make him disregard them.

<sup>d</sup> The same expression is used in reference to the same event, book v. letter 19, and is no doubt taken from something said upon that occasion. The person alluded to is generally acknowledged to be Hirrus.

<sup>e</sup> The word in the original, rauduculum, or rauduculum, is probably derived from rudus, "rubbish," and thence is used for the "sweepings," "crumbs," or "little remains" of a debt. It is used in the same sense, book iv. letter 8.

<sup>f</sup> In the text it is hæperes, "stranger;" but I have thought it better to adopt the very easy alteration of hæstis, agreeably to book vii. letter 2.

<sup>g</sup> Bibulus, when he was joint consul with Cæsar, had been insulted and violently driven from the forum; in consequence of which he afterwards shut himself up in his house, and acted only by the publication of edicts. See book ii. letter 21.

<sup>d</sup> Hortensius was lately dead. It appears from the preface to Cicero's treatise "De Claris Oratoribus," that he heard of this event at Rhodes on his return from Cilicia. And it is on this account that I have transposed the order of this and the preceding letter, which it is evident was written previous to his arrival at Rhodes.

<sup>f</sup> The meaning is, that this anticipation of what might be objected to him, is the reason he professes for not appointing his brother. To Atticus he subjoins the real reason, which is his fear of some misconduct from his brother's hasty disposition.

<sup>h</sup> An age when it became desirable to avoid contentions, as we meet, I may be able to make my determination. But I am writing more than enough; for I have no time to spare, and am sending by one who will either arrive with me or not much before. Cicero<sup>a</sup> presents his compliments. You will present those of both of us to Pilia and to your laughter.

LETTER IX.

IMMEDIATELY upon my landing in the Piræus<sup>b</sup> on the 14th of October, I received from my servant Acastus your letter, which I had long expected; but before I unsealed it, I took notice of its shortness; when I had opened it, I was struck with the evenness of the letters, which you generally form very correctly and distinctly. In short, I perceived from thence, what you mention to be the case, that you came to Rome the 20th of September with fever. Being greatly concerned, though not more than I ought, I immediately inquired of Acastus. He assured me that both you and he thought you were quite well, and that he had the same account from your own people; at the same time that he acknowledged, conformably to the conclusion of your letter, that you had some degree of fever at the time you wrote. I am very sensible of your illness, yet surprised that you should nevertheless have written with your own hand. But enough of this; for I hope from your prudence and temperance, nay, as Acastus bids me, I trust, that you are, I wish you, already well. I am glad you received my letter I sent you by Turannius. Watch, especially, if you love me, the greediness<sup>c</sup> of this

In the original is a Greek word, derived from *Philo-*us, which marks the meaning of the author. The a "confounder" refers to the confusion which Philo- confounder. Take care that he do not touch this Præcian inheritance, how little soever it may be. It gives me much concern, for I had a great regard for the man. Say that I have need of money for the splendour of my triumph; in regard to which, as you advise, you shall find me neither vain in demanding it, nor insensible in rejecting it. I understand by your letter, that Turannius told you I had consigned the province to my brother. Do you think I should so ill interpret your guarded expression, when you say you doubted<sup>d</sup>? What need was there of doubt, if there was any reason for wishing my brother to be left, and such a brother? It was to my mind a prohibition, not a doubt. You advise me by no means to leave the young Quintus Cicero. That is the very exposition of my own sentiments. We have seen everything in the same light as if we had conversed together. It could not be done otherwise; and your continued doubt freed me from all doubt. But I imagine you have received a letter written more fully upon this subject. I mean to send my messenger to-morrow, who will probably arrive before our friend Saufeius; yet it was hardly right to let him go to you without a letter from me. Write to me as you promise, about my dear Tullia, that is, about Dolabella; about the republic, which I foresee is in great danger; about the censors, especially what is done about statues and pictures, whether any proposition is made<sup>e</sup>. I send this letter on the 15th of October, the day on which, as you say, Cæsar is to bring four legions to Placentia. What, I beseech you, is to become of us? I enjoy my present station in the citadel at Athens.

Titus had admitted into his accounts. See letters 4 and 5 of this book. <sup>c</sup> See letter 6 of this book.

<sup>d</sup> It was probably expected that the censors might introduce some regulations upon these articles, with the view of repressing the luxury of the age.

BOOK VII.

LETTER I.

SENT a letter by L. Saufeius, and to you alone<sup>a</sup>; though I had hardly time to write, yet I did like that one so intimate should go to you without a letter from me. But, considering the rate philosophers travel, I imagine this will reach first. If, however, you have received that, you will know that I came to Athens the 14th of October; and that upon landing in the Piræus, I received your letter from my friend Acastus, not without uneasiness at your having arrived at Rome with a fever. I was, however, relieved by hearing from Acastus that you were as much better as could wish. But I quite shudder at the information which your letter brought about Cæsar's sickness. I also begged you to take care that the news (or, as the Greeks call it, the philotimia) I know whom<sup>b</sup>, might not injure me; about which I had written to you some time ago. Turannius had misinformed you at Brundisium, as I did by a letter from that excellent man Xeno.

I explained shortly why I had not left my brother in charge of the province. This was the substance of that letter. Now hear the rest. I entreat you by your fortunes, to employ all the affection with which you embrace me, and all your prudence, which I always admire, in taking into consideration the whole of my situation. For I seem to see such a contest; unless the same Providence, which delivered me from the Parthian war, better than I dared to hope, should have compassion upon the republic; such I say as never was before. But this calamity is common to me with everybody else; upon this I do not require your advice. That which is my own affair I beg you to undertake. Do you perceive how, at your instance, I have attached myself to both parties? And I wish I had from the first attended to your friendly admonition. "But," as Homer says, "your persuasions did not reach my heart; for nothing is sweeter than one's country." At length, however, you did persuade me to embrace the one, because he had been so kind to me; the other, because he was so powerful. I have done it, therefore, and done it with all readiness, so that nobody is more esteemed by either of them. For I considered that my connexion with Pompeius did not oblige me to transgress against the republic; nor, because I agreed with Cæsar, was I to fight against Pompeius; such was their union. Now, as you show, and as I plainly see, the utmost contention between them is to be apprehended. And each reckons me of his side, unless one of them feigns. For Pompeius does not doubt (and he judges rightly) of my highly approving his present sentiments with regard to the republic. I have received letters to this effect from both of them, at the same time that you received yours; as if neither esteemed anybody more than me. What should I do then? I do not mean when they come to extremities; for if it is to be decided by arms, I am clear that it is better to be conquered with the one, than to conquer with the other; but I speak of the questions which will be agitated at the period of my arrival; whether one, who is absent, be eligible; whether he should not dismiss his army. "Speak, Marcus Tullius." What shall I say? Wait, I beseech you, till I can see Atticus. There is no room for trifling. Shall I oppose Cæsar? Where then is our strict attachment? For, I helped to procure him this permission by applying to Cælius the tribune of the people at the request of Pompeius himself* at Ravenna. "Of Pompeius?" Even of our Cnæus, in that famous third consulate. Should I now change my sentiments? "I have too much respect (not only for Pompeius, but) for the Trojan men and women. Polydamus will be the first to reproach me." Who? You yourself, who are used to commend both my actions and my writings. I have escaped this blow during the two preceding consulates of the Marcelli, when Cæsar's province was taken into consideration. Now I fall into the very crisis. There let any blockhead give his opinion first; I am mightily pleased to be engaged about my triumph, and to have so good an excuse for remaining without the city. Yet people will try to elicit my sentiments. You will perhaps laugh at what I am going to say. How I should wish even now to be staying in my province! It was clearly desirable if this was hanging over us, though nothing could be more disagreeable. For, by-the-bye, I would have you know, that all those first appearances, which in your letters you commended to the skies, have dissolved away. The practice of virtue itself is not an easy thing; but how difficult is a continual pretence of it! For when I thought it right and honourable, out of the yearly sums which had been voted for my expenses, to leave a yearly sum for the quaestor C. Cælius, and to bring into the treasury a thousand sestertia (8000*l.*); my attendants murmured, thinking it ought all to have been divided amongst them; as if I should be more attentive to the treasures of the Phrygians and Cilicians, than to our own. But they did not move me: for my own applause has the greatest weight with me. Yet there is nothing that could be done for the honour of any person, which I have omitted. But this, as Thucydides says, is an excursion from the subject, not without its use. But pray consider my situation; how, in the first place, I may retain the favour of Cæsar; then about my triumph; which, unless the times of the republic prevent it, I conceive to be easily attainable. I judge so both from the letters of my friends, and from the supplication, when he, who did not vote for it, voted more than if he had decreed the greatest triumph<sup>1</sup>. With him Favonius, my familiar friend, was one who concurred in opinion; another was Hirrus, who was angry with me. Yet Cato was present at the drawing up of the decree, and wrote to me most pleasantly upon the subject of his vote. But Cæsar, in congratulating with me about the supplication, exults upon the opinion delivered by Cato; but mentions nothing of what Cato said upon the occasion; only that he voted against the supplication. I come back to Hirrus. You had begun to reconcile him to me: go on with it. You have Scrofa, you have Silius to assist you. I have already written to them and to Hirrus himself. For he had kindly informed them, that he could have stopped it, but did not choose to do so: but that he had concurred with Cato my particular friend, when he made such honourable mention of me; and that I had not written to him, though I wrote to everybody else. He said truly; for to him alone, and to Crassipes, I had not written. So much then for public affairs. Let us return home. I wish to separate myself from that man<sup>2</sup>. He has strangely perplexed my accounts, a very Lartidius<sup>3</sup>; "but let us leave what is already done, however we may regret it." Let us despatch the rest; and this first, in which I have some care added to my affliction; but this Precian affair<sup>4</sup>, whatever it is, I should be sorry to have confounded with those accounts of mine which he has in his hands. I have written to Terentia<sup>5</sup>, and likewise to him, that I should put together in your hands whatever money I could collect, for the equipment of my expected triumph. This, I conceive, must be unobjectionable. But as they please. Take upon you this care also<sup>6</sup>, how we may endeavour to accomplish what you propose. This both you have pointed out in some letter, (from Epirus was it? or from Athens?) and I will assist you in it.

* So I understand this, which has usually been otherwise interpreted.

LETTER II.

I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 24th of November, after as favourable a voyage as your own; so charmingly did a gentle gale waft us from Epirus. The words have run into a verse, which, if you please, you may impose upon some young man for your own. I am much concerned at your illness; for your letters show that you are very far from well; and I, who know your fortitude, suspect it must be something serious that obliges you to give way.

<sup>6</sup> I conceive the conclusion of this letter to relate altogether to some new subject mentioned previously by Atticus, and not improbably concerning Q. Cicero, or Pomponia, whose disagreement is mentioned, book vi. letter 2.

and almost overpowers you; though your servant Pamphilus assured me that the quartan fits of your ague had left you, and that another milder form had succeeded; and Terentia, who came to the gate of Brundisium at the same time that I entered the harbour, and who met me in the forum, said that L. Pontius had informed her in Trebulanum, that this also had left you: which, if it be so, is what I exceedingly wish, and hope indeed that your prudence and temperance may have effected. I come now to your letters, of which I have received six hundred<sup>d</sup> at once, each more acceptable than the former, and all in your own hand. I used to love Alexis's handwriting, because it bore so near a resemblance to your own; yet I loved it not, as howing that you were not well. The mention of its name brings to my mind Tiro<sup>e</sup>, whom I have left at Patre; a young man, as you know; and I, if you please, an honest one; I know nothing better. Therefore I miss him sadly; and though I did not think himself dangerously ill, yet I cannot help being anxious about him, and place my warmest hope in the attention of M. Curius<sup>f</sup>, which he has signified to me by letter, and many persons have mentioned. Curius himself is sensible how much you wish him to be in my esteem: and indeed am highly pleased with him; for he possesses a natural urbanity of manners which is very amiable. He has a will sealed with the seals of the Ciceros<sup>g</sup> and those of the prætorian<sup>h</sup> cohort, in which he has openly bequeathed to you a pound, to me a half-penny<sup>i</sup>. I was sumptuously entertained by the action<sup>j</sup> at Actium in Corcyra<sup>k</sup>. There was no insisting Cicero's wish of seeing Thymis<sup>l</sup>. I am obliged that you take pleasure in your little girl, and that the affection of parents towards their children is proved to you to be natural<sup>m</sup>. For about this there can be no natural union between man and man; and if this is taken away, the very course of life is destroyed. May it turn out, I said Carneades grossly; yet more modestly in our friend Lucius<sup>n</sup>, and Patron; who in arranging everything to their own gratification, do

It has been repeatedly seen in former letters that this is a familiar expression for any great number.

Tiro was Cicero's amanuensis, as Alexis was Atticus's. Book vi. letter 6, we find him left sick at Issus. It is supposed that he afterwards proceeded as far as Patre, to Peloponnesus, and was there again laid up under the care of Curius.

M. Curius is said to have been quæstor and tribune at Actium, and afterwards to have settled as a merchant at Actium.—Ep. Fam. iv. 5, et xlii. 50.

The sons of Marcus and Quintus.

This seems to have been a sort of guard of honour.

This passage is attended with great obscurity, owing recently to its being a jest, which is no longer intelligible. I suspect the point of it may consist in some playful misapplication of the terms libella and teruncius, ad of as and triens, whereby Cicero and Atticus might be entitled to a mere trifle, instead of inheriting the estate. And if the text of Tortorio be correct, it may be intended blunder of the same kind.

Lexion was a physician. See book xv. letter 1.

The place called Actium of Corcyra was different from Actium afterwards distinguished by the naval action between Augustus and Antonius.

Thymis was a river of Epirus, where Atticus's property was situated.

This is said in opposition to the tenets of Atticus's philosophy, which referred everything to pleasure.

Lucius Torquatus. He and Patron were both Epicurean. I do not think any thing whatever should be done for the sake of another; and when they say that the reason why a man ought to be good, is that he may escape harm, not because it is naturally right; they do not perceive that they are describing a crafty man instead of a good man. But this I believe is in those books<sup>p</sup>, which you encourage me by praising. I return to my subject. I was eagerly expecting the letter, which you had sent by Philoxenus; for you had mentioned that it contained an account of your conversation with Pompeius at Naples; this Patron delivered to me at Brundisium. I believe he had received it at Corcyra. Nothing could be more acceptable. For it related to the republic; to the opinion which he entertained of my integrity; to the kindness which he showed in his discourse about the triumph. But what pleased me most of all was, that I understood you had visited him for the purpose of discovering his disposition towards me: this, I say, was the circumstance most agreeable to me. With respect to the triumph, however, I never had any wish for it before that barefaced letter of Bibulus, which was followed by so full a supplication. Had he really done what he described, I should rejoice, and favour his pretensions. But now, that he, who never set his foot beyond the gate so long as the enemy was on this side the Euphrates, should be loaded with honours; and that I, on whose troops his army placed their whole reliance, should not attain the same; this is a disgrace to us; to us, I say, including you. I shall therefore make every exertion, and hope I shall succeed. If you were well, I might already have had some particulars investigated: but I trust you will soon be well. I love you for this Numerian remnant<sup>q</sup>. I want to know what is become of Hortensius<sup>r</sup>; what Cato is doing, who has in truth been shamefully hostile towards me. He gave me his testimony for integrity, justice, clemency, fidelity, which I did not ask; what I did ask, he refused. How therefore does Cæsar, in the same letter in which he congratulates me and promises every thing, exult in the injury I have received from Cato's ingratitude? Yet this very man voted to Bibulus a supplication of 20 days. Pardon me; I cannot bear this, nor will I. I wish to reply to all your letters; but there is no occasion, since I shall see you so soon. But as to that business of Chrysippus (for about the other, a mere mechanic, I was less surprised, though nothing could be worse than his conduct); but for Chrysippus, whom on account of some little proficiency in learning I entertained with kindness, and had in esteem; that he should leave the boy without my knowledge! I omit many other things which I hear of him; I omit his thefts; but his running away I cannot bear; there is nothing that I think more wicked. I have accordingly followed the old principle, as it is said, of the prætor Drusus, in the case of one who would not swear to observe the same conditions after he had obtained his liberty; I have not pronounced them free: especially as there was nobody present by whom their liberation could properly be asserted. You will receive this as you shall think fit. I assent to your judgment. To one most eloquent letter of yours I have not replied, in which you speak of the dangers of the republic. What should I reply? I was exceedingly disturbed. But the Parthians do nothing to occasion me much alarm, and have suddenly left Bibulus half alive.

LETTER III.

THE sixth of December I came to Herculanium<sup>a</sup> and there read your letter, which Philotimus delivered to me. The moment I saw it I had the satisfaction of recognising your own hand-writing; afterwards I was exceedingly delighted with the accurate information it contained. With respect to the first point, in which you say you differ from Diccærchus<sup>b</sup>, though I had earnestly requested (and that with your concurrence) that I might not be obliged to remain in the province longer than one year; yet this was not accomplished by our endeavours. For you must know that not a word was mentioned in the senate about any of us, who held provincial governments, remaining beyond the time appointed by the decree of the senate. So that I cannot justly be charged with any blame for having left the province earlier than might, perhaps, have been desirable. But what if it be better as it is? This has often appeared to be the case on other occasions as well as on this. For whether things can be brought to an agreement, or to the discomfiture of the evil-disposed, in either case I should be glad to give my assistance, or at least not to be out of the way. But if the good are overpowered, wherever I might be, I should be overpowered with them. Therefore, the quickness of my return ought not to be regretted. And if the idea of a triumph had not been thrown in my way, which you also approve, truly you should not now much want that character, which is drawn in my sixth book<sup>c</sup>. For what should I do to satisfy you, who have devoured those books? I should not even now hesitate to lay aside this object<sup>d</sup>, great as it is, if it be more proper to do so. But it is impossible to pursue both at the same time, and while I serve my ambitious views in a triumph, to exert a free spirit in the cause of the republic. Do not, however, doubt, but that whichever is the more honourable, that will be to me the more desirable. For what you seem to recommend, that I should continue to hold my command, and remain out of the city<sup>e</sup>, both as being safer for myself, and as affording the means of rendering service to the republic, how this is we will consider when we meet. It is a thing that admits of deliberation, though in great measure I agree with you. You do well in not doubting of my affection towards the republic; and you judge rightly that he<sup>f</sup> has by no means acted liberally towards me, considering my services and his profusion to other people; and you justly explain the reason of this, which entirely agrees with what you say has been done in the case of Fabius and Caninius. But if this were not so, and he had devoted himself wholly to me, yet that guardian<sup>g</sup> divinity of the city which you mention would compel me to remember its noble inscription, and would not permit me to imitate Volcarius or Servius, with whom you are satisfied, but would call upon me to feel and to act as became me. And this I would readily do, if it might be done in a different manner from what is now required. For at this time people are contending for their own power, at the risk of the state. If it is in defence of the republic, why was it not defended at the time when this very man was consul? And the year following why was not I defended, with whose cause the safety of the republic was identified? Why was his command prolonged? or why in that manner? Why was such a struggle made that the ten tribunes of the people should propose the decree for his eligibility in his absence? By these means he is become so powerful, that now it is left to a single citizen to resist him; who I wish had never given him such power, instead of now opposing him, when he is so strong. But since affairs are brought to this situation, I shall not, as you say, "look out for the vessel of the Atreide<sup>h</sup>:" the only vessel for me shall be that which is steered by Pompeius. When you ask, what must be done if I am called upon—"Speak, M. Tullius, concisely." I assent to Cn. Pompeius. Yet privately I shall exhort Pompeius to peace. For I am convinced that affairs are in the greatest danger. You, who are in the city, know more. But this I see, that we have to do with a man of the boldest and readiest spirit; that all convicts, all disgraced persons, and all that deserve to be convicted and disgraced, incline to that party; almost all the youth, all the city rabble, the powerful tribunes, with the addition of C. Cassius; all who are oppressed with debt, whom I understand to be more than I had supposed. That cause wants nothing but a good cause; it has everything else in abundance. In such a state everybody ought to exert himself to prevent a decision by arms, the event of which is always uncertain, but in the present case rather to be dreaded in favour of one party<sup>i</sup>. Bibulus has left his province, and deputed the command on Veiento. He will not, as I hear, hurry himself in his departure. Cato, when he got him his honours, declared that the only persons towards whom he bore no jealousy were those whose influence could receive little or no increase. I come now to my private concerns; for I have mostly replied to your letter on the subject of the republic, and to that from your villa, and to that which you wrote afterwards. I come to my private concerns. One word, also, about Cælius. He is so far from shaking my opinion, that I think he will himself repent of having changed his own. But how is it that Luccius's buildings should have been adjudged to him? I am surprised that you should have omitted to mention it. About Philotimus I will do as you advise. I did not, however, expect from him at this time the accounts which he gave you; but the remainder which he desired me in Tusculanum to enter into my book with my own hand, and of which he also gave me a memorandum in Asia, written with his hand. If he made this good, he would himself owe me as much, or more, than what he there declares to be the amount of my debt. But hereafter, if only the condition of the republic permit, I will not subject myself to accusations of this kind: not, indeed, that I had before been negligent; but I was occupied with the multitude of my friends. I shall be glad, therefore, to avail myself of your assistance and advice, you promise, and hope I shall not be giving you much trouble. Respecting those clogs<sup>b</sup> of my short, there is no cause for uneasiness; for they directed themselves on observing my integrity. Not anybody vexed me more than one whom you at suspect. His behaviour was at first excellent, and is so now; but at the moment of my departure: intimated that he had hoped to receive something; and he did not restrain that covetousness which had gradually influenced his mind. But he on recovered himself; and overcome by my honourable services towards him, he esteemed them more value than any sum of money. I have received from Curius a will<sup>c</sup>, which I carry with me. I have been informed of Hortensius's legacies<sup>d</sup>. I now want to know what sort of a man Curius is, and what it is that he intends to sell at auction. For if Cælius has got possession of the house at the Flumentan gate, I know not why I may not take for myself that at Puteoli. I come now to the word Pirææ, in which I am more reprehensible, that being a Roman, I should have written Pirææ<sup>e</sup>, not Piræus (as all our people call it), and that I should have added the preposition in; for I have not considered it as the name of a town, but of a district<sup>f</sup>. Yet our friend Dionysius, who is with me, and Nicias the Coan, did not think Pirææ to be a town. But I will see about

My error, if it be one, consists in my having taken of it not as a town, but as a district. And have followed, I do not say Cæcilius, "In the evening when I went out of the port into Piræus;" he is no authority for Latinity; but Terentius, in his comedies, on account of the elegance of his language, were supposed to be written by Curius: "Yesterday, I and some other young men went together into Piræus." And again: "The merchant added this, that she had been taken out of Canium." For if we choose to call districts cania, Sunium is as much a town as Piræus. But our author is a grammarian, if you can solve this question, you will relieve me from much embarrassment. Cæsar writes in a kind manner to me: he does the same in his name. My resolution never to stir an inch from the path of honour.

Perperæ are described to be instruments for keeping hot the legs of children who are disposed to be crooked. Perperæ may be adopted from Atticus, and applied to persons who had proved a clog and embarrassment in his administration.

<sup>e</sup> It is well known that the Romans did not insert the in in speaking of going to or from any town, they did express them when speaking of a country.

But you know how much remains due to him<sup>h</sup>. Do you think, then, it is to be feared that anybody should object that debt to me, if I seem to act feebly? or that he should demand it, if I act firmly? What do you find in answer to this? Let us pay it, you say. Well, then, I will borrow from Cælius<sup>i</sup>. Yet I would have you consider this well; for I imagine if ever I should speak with energy in the senate in behalf of the republic, that Tarteasian friend of yours<sup>j</sup> will call to me as I go out, "Pray direct the money to be provided." Have I anything more to say? Yes, my son-in-law is agreeable to me, to Tullia, to Terentia. He has as much wit and kindness as you could wish. As to other things, to which you are no stranger, we must bear them. For you know about whom we inquired<sup>k</sup>; who all, except him with whom I negotiated through you, think to make me responsible: for nobody will trust them. But of these matters when we meet; for they require a long talk. My hope of Tiro's recovery rests in M. Curius, to whom I have written that such service would be particularly acceptable to you. Dated the 9th of December, from Pontius's house at Tretulanum.

LETTER IV.

DIONYSIUS is impatient to see you. I have accordingly sent him, not with a very good grace; but there was no refusing it. I have found him learned, which I knew before; and besides, of correct behaviour, ready to oblige, studious of my reputation, careful, and (that I may not seem to be giving the character of a freed-man) in short an excellent man. I saw Pompeius the 10th of December. We were together perhaps two hours. He seemed to be much pleased at my arrival. He encouraged me in the affair of my triumph, and promised to do his part; advising me not to go to the senate till I should have finished this business, from fear of alienating any of the tribunes by the sentiments that might be delivered. In short, as far as words, nothing could be fuller of kindness. On the subject of the republic, he talked to me as if a war was inevitable. There appeared to be no hope of accommodation. His opinion of Cæsar's hostility had lately been confirmed by the arrival of Hirtius from Cæsar, with whom he was very intimate: for he had not called upon Pompeius; but having arrived on the evening of December 6th, and Balbus having engaged to go to Scipio before it was light upon this whole business, he returned late at night to Cæsar. This he considered as a plain sign of hostility. In short, nothing else affords me comfort, but that I cannot suppose he, to whom even his enemies had given a second consulate, to whom fortune had given the greatest power, would be so mad, as to bring these advantages to the hazard of a contest. But if he venture to rush on, I confess I am full of fears, which I dare not commit to paper. As things now are, I think of getting to Rome the 5th of January.

LETTER V.

I HAVE received several of your letters at the same time; and though I had later intelligence from people who came to meet me, yet they were very acceptable, as they showed your attention and kindness. I am concerned at your illness; and perceive that you suffer still greater uneasiness from Pilia's being attacked in a similar manner. Apply yourselves, both of you, to your recovery. I see the interest you take about Tiro. But, though he is of wonderful service to me, when he is well, in every species either of business or of study, yet I am more anxious for his recovery on account of his own kind and modest disposition, than for any advantage towards myself. Philogenes has never said anything to me about Luscienus. Dionysius will inform you of other matters. I am surprised that your sister should not have come to Arcanum<sup>1</sup>. I am not sorry that you approve of my determination respecting Chrysippus<sup>2</sup>. I have no intention of going to Tusculanum at this time. It is out of the way for those who might come to meet me, and has some other inconveniences. But I mean to proceed from Formianum to Terracina the 31st of December; thence to the extremity of the Pontine marsh; thence to Pompeius's villa at Albanum; and so to Rome the 3d of January, my birth-day. I daily become more alarmed about the republic. For even the good, as it is supposed, are not agreed. How many knights, how many senators have I seen, who severely blame, among other things, this journey of Pompeius! We have great need of peace. From a victory must arise many evils, and most assuredly that of a tyrant. But these things we shall very soon have an opportunity of discussing in person. There is now absolutely nothing that I can write about. Not about the republic, because our information is the same: and our domestic affairs are known to both. It only remains to joke, if this man<sup>3</sup> permit. For my part I should think it wiser to grant him what he asks, than to meet in arms. It is too late now to resist one whom we have for ten years fostered against ourselves. What do you advise then? you will say. Nothing but with your concurrence; nor indeed anything before my business<sup>4</sup> is either concluded, or laid aside. Take care then to get well; and shake off at length this ague with the diligence you so highly possess.

LETTER VI.

I HAVE absolutely nothing to say to you. You are acquainted with everything; nor have I anything to expect from you. Let me then only keep up my custom of not suffering anybody to go to you without a letter. I am in great fear about the republic; and have hitherto scarcely found anybody who did not think it better to grant Cæsar what he demanded, than to go to war. His demands are indeed greater than was supposed. But why should we now first resist him? For this is not a greater evil than when we prolonged his government for five years; or when we introduced the law permitting him to be a candidate for the consulship in his absence. Unless forthwith we then gave him these arms, that we might now fight with him well prepared. You will say, "What then will be your opinion?" Not what I shall say. For I shall think that everything ought to be done to avoid a battle; I shall say the same as Pompeius. Nor shall I do this with an abject spirit; but this again is a very great evil to the state, and in some measure peculiarly improper for me, that I should appear to differ from Pompeius in so important a cause.

LETTER VII.

"DIONYSIUS, an excellent man, as I have also found him, and very learned, and full of affection towards you, arrived in Rome the 18th of December, and delivered to me your letter." These are the very expressions contained in your letter about Dionysius. You do not add—"and he returns thanks to you." But he certainly ought: and such is your kindness that, if he had done so, you would have mentioned it. I do not however recast the testimony given of him in my former letter. Let him therefore be called an excellent man. For even this is well done, that he should have given me this means of thoroughly knowing him. Philogenes has informed you truly. He had provided what he ought<sup>5</sup>; and I desired him to make use of the money till it should be wanted. He has accordingly had the use of it thirteen months. I hope Pontinius is well; but from what you mention of his having entered the city, I am fearful what may be the matter<sup>6</sup>. For he would not have done so, but for some important reason. As the 2d of January is the day of the Compitalia<sup>7</sup>, I do not care to go to Albanum<sup>8</sup> that day, from fear of being troublesome to the family; I shall therefore go on the third; and thence to the city on the fourth. I do not know on what day your fit recurs; but I should be sorry to have you disturbed under the inconvenience of your illness. Respecting the honour of my triumph, unless Cæsar employ any secret measures through his tribunes, everything else seems to be tranquil. Most tranquil certainly is my own mind, which looks upon the whole with indifference; and the more so, because I hear from many persons that Pompeius and his council have determined to send me into Sicily, as holding a command. This is worthy of Abdera<sup>9</sup>. For the senate has passed no decree, and the people no law, for my having a command in Sicily. But if the republic gives this authority to Pompeius, why should he send me, rather than any private person? If therefore this command is likely to give me trouble, I shall avail myself of the first gate I see<sup>10</sup>. For as to what you say of there being a wonderful expectation of my arrival, though at the same time none of the good, or no-derately good, entertain any doubt of my sentiments: I do not understand whom you call good: for my own part I know none, at least if we look for whole orders of men, for undoubtedly there are individuals who are good. But in civil dissensions we ought to look for ranks and orders of good men. Do you think then the senate is good, which has left the provinces without commanders? For Curio could never have maintained his purpose if any attempt had been made to resist him. But the senate would not follow that advice; from whence it happened that no successor to Cæsar was appointed. Or the public renters? Who were never steady, but now are quite in Cæsar's interests. Or the bankers? Or farmers? Who have most reason to wish for peace; unless you suppose those people to be afraid of living under a government who have never objected to it, nor did they could live in peace. What then? Must we admit the pretensions of one absent, who still keeps his army after the day appointed by law is past? I say at once, of nobody absent, or if this is granted, the other follows of course. Do we admit a government of ten years? and so much more? Then we must admit also my banishment, and the loss of the Campanian territory*, and the adoption of a patrician by a plebeian, of a man of Cadiz by one of Mitylene; and we must admit the wealth of Labienus and Mamurra, and the gardens and Tusculan villa of Balbus. The source of all these is the same. He should have resisted while he was weak, and the thing was easy. Now there are eleven legions, as many cavalry as he pleases, people beyond the Po, people in the city, so many tribunes of the people, such an abandoned body of young men, a leader of such authority, such boldness; this is the man with whom we must fight, or admit his pretensions, which are also sanctioned by the law. "Fight," I say, "rather than be a slave." For what object? That if you are conquered, you may be enslaved? If you conquer, that you may still be a slave? What then, say you, will you do? The same as cattle, which being scattered about follow herds of their own species. As one ox follows the others, so shall I follow the good, or those who have the reputation of good, though they rush to their destruction. I see clearly what is at issue in our sad straits. For nobody can say that we come to arms what will be the issue; everybody knows that if the good are beaten, no man will neither be more sparing of the blood of the principal citizens, than Cinna was; nor be more moderate than Sulla, in plundering the rich. We have been a long time talking politics with you, and should continue if my lamp were not going out.

To be short,—I speak, Marcus Tullius, as I do with Pompeius: that is, with T. Pomponius. I make my compliments to that nice boy Alexis, as perhaps in my absence he is become a young man,—for he seemed to be growing up very fast.

* His Curio was a tribune, and creature of Cæsar, and therefore stopped the appointment of the new governors before Cæsar from a successor.

That Cæsar, though absent, might yet be eligible to consulship; for, had he come up to Rome, he must have resigned his command.

namely, peace. See letter 3 of this book.

LETTER VIII.

WHAT need of such strong affirmation on the subject of Dionysius? Would not a mere nod from you secure my belief? But your silence gave me the greater suspicion, both because you generally employ your testimony to consolidate friendships, and I heard that he had spoken differently of me to other people. But I am perfectly satisfied that it is as you say. I therefore continue to regard him as you would have me. I had also marked the day of your ague from one of your letters written as the fit was coming on, and I calculated that you might, if there was occasion, come to me in Albanum without inconvenience the 3d of January. But pray do nothing that is inconsistent with your health. For what signifies one or two days? I understand that, by Livia's will, Dolabella with two co-heirs succeeds to a third part of her property, but on the condition of changing his name. It is a question of propriety whether it be right for a young man of noble birth to change his name for a lady's will. But we shall be able to determine this more philosophically, when we know to about how much this third of the third part of her property amounts. What you thought would be the case, that I should see Pompeius before I got to Rome, has accordingly happened. For on the 27th of December he came up to me at Lavernum. We came together to Formizæ, and conversed privately from two in the afternoon till dusk. In answer to your inquiry, if there is any hope of accommodation, so far as I have learned from Pompeius's full and accurate discourse, there is not even any inclination towards it. For his opinion is, that if Cæsar should be made consul, even with the dismissal of his army, the government will be overturned. He even thinks, that when he is acquainted with the active preparations against him, he will neglect the consulate this year, and prefer keeping his army and his province. But if he should be driven to madness, he held him in great contempt, and relied upon his own forces and those of the republic. In truth, though that saying often occurred to me, that the fortune of war was common; yet it was some alleviation of my solicitude, to hear a brave and experienced man, and one of the greatest authority, politically expose the dangers of a false peace. We had in our possession Antonius's speech pronounced the 23d of December, which contained an accusation of Pompeius from the time of his entering into public life, complaining of those who had been condemned, and of the terror of his arms. Upon which he observed, "What think you that Cæsar himself will do, if he should obtain the government of the state, when his weak and needy quæstor dares to utter such expressions?" In short, he appeared not only not to wish for such a peace, but even to dread it. Yet the apprehension of abandoning the city shakes, as I conceive, this resolution. It is a great vexation to me, that I must pay off my debt to Cæsar, and transfer to that quarter the materials of my triumph. For it is unseemly to be indebted to one of an opposite party. But of this, and many other things, when we meet.

b The text is obscure, and perhaps faulty.

LETTER IX.

"AM I," say you, "to receive a letter from you every day?" Yes, if I find anybody to whom I can give it. "But you are on the point of being here yourself." It will then be time enough to stop when I arrive. I find there is one of your letters which has never reached me, owing to my friend L. Quintius, who was bringing it, being robbed and wounded at Basilus's monument. Consider therefore, if it contained anything of importance for me to know. At the same time resolve me this political problem. Since one of these things must take place: either 1st, that Cæsar should be deemed eligible, while he still retains his army through the senate, or through the tribunes of the people; or 2dly, that Cæsar must be persuaded to give up his province and his army, in order to become consul; or 3dly, if this cannot be done, that the comitia may be held without any consideration of him, yet with his suffering it, and retaining his province; or, 4thly, if through the interference of the tribunes he does not suffer the comitia to proceed, but yet remains quiet, that the business may be brought to an interregnum; or, 5thly, if in order to enforce his claims, he should bring up his army, that we must then contend in arms; and 6thly, that he may either begin the contest immediately, before we are sufficiently prepared; or, 7thly, after his friends have preferred at the comitia their request for his eligibility, and have been refused; he may also, 8thly, proceed to arms either for that single reason, that his claims are not admitted; or 9thly, for an additional reason if it happen that any tribune, in his attempt to interrupt the senate, or to excite the populace, should be marked or circumvented by a decree of the senate, or removed, or expelled, or should flee to him under pretence of being expelled: again, when war is actually begun, we must either, 10thly, remain in possession of the city,—or 11thly, we must leave it, in order to intercept his supplies of provisions and troops. Tell methen of these evils, to one of which we must certainly submit, which you think the least. You will say, "that he should be persuaded to deliver up his army in order to be made consul." It is indeed a measure of such a kind, that if he consents nothing can be said against it; and if he does not obtain the admission of his claims, I shall be surprised if he does not do it. Yet there are some persons who think nothing is more to be dreaded than that he should be consul. "But so," you will say, "is better than with his army." Certainly. But this very so may well make one exclaim, O what a great calamity! and it admits of no remedy; we must submit at his discretion. Think of him a second time consul, whom you remember in his former consulate. At that time, in his weakness, he out-matched, you say, the whole republic; what do you expect now? And when he is consul, Pompeius is resolved to be in Spain. This is a sad state, that the very thing which is most to be deprecated, cannot be refused; and if he does it, he will presently attain the highest favour amongst all good men. But setting aside this, to which they say he can never be brought, of the remaining evils which is the worst? To yield to what Pompeius calls his most impudent demands? For what can be more impudent? You have held the province for ten years, granted you not by the senate, but by yourself, through violence and faction. The period has elapsed, not of the law, but of your self-will; but suppose it to be of the law, a decree is passed for appointing a successor, you stop it, and say, "Have consideration for me." Have you for us? Would you keep your army longer than the people granted it? and against the will of the senate? "You must fight then, unless you agree to it." With a good hope, as Pompeius says, either of conquering or of dying in liberty. If now we must fight, the time depends upon accidents; the manner, on future events: on this subject therefore I do not call upon you. If you have anything to offer in reply to what I have said, let me hear it. I am tortured with anxiety day and night.

LETTER X.

I HAVE suddenly come to the resolution of setting out before light, to avoid observation and discourse, especially as my lictors come with their laurels<sup>c</sup>. For the rest, truly I neither know what I am doing, or what I shall do; so much am I disturbed with the rash determination<sup>d</sup> of our general, who seems to have lost his senses. How can I advise you, who am myself waiting for your advice? What has been Cæsar's object, or what is now his object, I cannot tell, cramped as he is within the towns, and appearing stupefied. If he remains in Italy, we shall all be together; but if he retires, our conduct must be a subject of consideration. Hitherto certainly, if I have any understanding, everything has been done foolishly and incautiously. Pray write to me very often, whatever comes into your mind.

LETTER XI.

WHAT, I beseech you, is all this? or what are people about? For I am quite in the dark. "We have got possession," you say, "of Cingulum; we have lost Anconis; Labienus has deserted from Cæsar." Are we speaking of a Roman general, or of Hannibal? O wretched man, and void of understanding<sup>e</sup>, who has never known even a shadow of what is truly honourable! Yet he professes to do all this for honour's sake. But how can there be honour, where there is not rectitude? Or is it right then to have an army without any public appointment? To occupy the towns of Roman citizens, in order to get a readier access to his own country? To cancel debts, to recall exiles, to institute six hundred other wicked practices, "in order to obtain (as Eteocles says<sup>f</sup>) the greatest kingdom of the gods?" I envy him not his fortune. I would assuredly prefer a single basking<sup>g</sup> with you in your Lucretine sun, before all kingdoms of such a kind; or rather I would die a thousand times, before I would suffer such a thought to enter my mind. "What if you should wish it,"

<sup>c</sup> The fasces borne by the lictors, or sergeants, attending one who had been saluted emperor, were bound with laurel till they entered the city. See book v. letter 20.

say? "For everybody is at liberty to wish." But I consider this very wish a thing more wretched than being crucified. The only thing that is worse, to get what you so wish. But enough of this; I am too ready to dwell upon these troubles than you: let us return to our own general. Tell me then, what think you of this resolution of Pompeius? I mean his leaving the city. I am quite at a loss: nothing seems more absurd. That you could leave the city? Would you then do the same the Gauls should come<sup>1</sup>? The republic, he says, does not consist in its walls, but in all that we hold dear. Themistocles did the same<sup>1</sup>. For a single day was unable to withstand the united flood of foreign nations. But Pericles did not so, fifty years afterwards, when besides the walls he kept his ground. And our own people formerly, when the city was captured, still kept possession of the citadel: "so have we heard the deeds of our great heroes." Yet by the grief of the towns, the conversation of those I meet, this reason seems likely to produce some effect. There is a wonderful complaint (I know not if it is made here; but you will tell me) that the city should be without magistrates, without a senate. In short, Pompeius by his flight creates a strong sensation. Do you think you? The case is quite altered, and it is thought that nothing should be granted to Caesar. Explain to me how all this is. I have a large army attended with little trouble: for Pompeius asks me to have the superintendence of all this district of Campania, and the sea-coast; so that the safety of troops, and all business of importance, be referred to me. I therefore expect to be settled. I imagine by this time you see what is Pompeius's impetuosity, what is the disposition of the republic, what is the state of the whole business: all these things I should be glad if you would tell me, and (as they are liable to change) as you can. For I feel some comfort both that I am writing to you, and whilst I am reading your letters.

LETTER XII.

I HAVE hitherto received but one letter from you dated the 20th<sup>1</sup>, in which it is mentioned that you had previously despatched another, which I had not received. But I beg you will write as soon as possible, not only if you have learned, or anything, but even if you suspect it; especially what you think I ought or ought not to do. I am so anxious to hear from you, that I should take care to know what Pompeius is doing; I do not know what he knows himself, and certainly nobody else. I saw the consul Lentulus at Formiae, and saw Libo. Everything is full of confusion. Pompeius is gone to Larinum, where the troops are, and at Luceria, Canusium, and other parts of Apulia. I therefore cannot be certain whether he means to stop anywhere, or cross the sea. If he remains, I doubt whether he will rely upon his army; if he goes away, what I should do, whither I should go, or where I should settle, I know not. For I apprehend he, whose evidently alludes to the city of Rome having been taken by the Gauls, the invasion of the Persians, and the Gauls, is alluding to the 20th of January.

tyranny you dread, will act most sadly. Neither the adjournment of public business, nor the flight of the senate and magistrates, nor the secret<sup>1</sup> treasury, will stop him. But this, as you say, we shall soon see. In the mean time you must excuse me for writing to you so much, and so often. For I feel some consolation from it, and besides am desirous of eliciting your letters in return, especially your advice, what I should do, or how I should conduct myself, and whether I should give myself up wholly to the party. I am not deterred by danger; but am distracted with grief. That everything should be conducted with such want of judgment, or so contrary to my own judgment! Or should I hesitate, and turn back, and join those who are in possession, and enjoy the smiles of fortune? "I have too much respect for the Trojans<sup>1</sup>," and am prevented by the duty not only of a citizen, but of a friend. But then I am unmannered by commiseration for the children. Write therefore something to me in my trouble, notwithstanding you feel the same distress; but especially if Pompeius should retire out of Italy, tell me what you think I ought to do. Manius Lepidus indeed (for we were together) has resolved to go no further than that; L. Torquatus says the same. I have many circumstances, and among the rest my lictors, to embarrass me. I never met with anything less capable of being disentangled. Therefore I ask for nothing certain, but only for what you think; and, in short, I wish to know your very doubtings. It is pretty certain that Labienus has left Caesar. If it had happened that on coming to Rome he could have found the magistrates and the senate there, it might have been of great service to our cause; as by it he would appear to pass sentence upon a friend for the sake of the republic. This appears indeed now, but is of less service; for there is nobody to serve; and I imagine he already repents of the step he has taken; unless perhaps the very circumstance of his having left him be false: I had it however for a truth. Now though, as you say, you confine yourself within your own boundaries, yet I wish you to explain to me the actual state of the city; whether there is expressed any wish for Pompeius; any dislike towards Caesar; also what you think about Terentia and Tullia, whether they should continue at Rome, or be with me, or retire to some place of safety. All this, and anything else that occurs, I should be glad to hear from you, and the oftener the better.

LETTER XIII.

I AGREE with you about the Vennonian business. I look upon Labienus as a hero. There has been for a long time no deed more distinguished amongst our citizens. If no other good arise from it, there is this at least, that it has given pain to Caesar. But I think moreover that it has some effect in advancing the general cause. I love Piso too, whose judgment of his son-in-law<sup>2</sup> must, I think, have weight. Though you see the nature of this contest. It is a civil war of such a kind, as does not arise from divisions among the members of the state, but from the audacity of one abandoned citizen. He is powerful from his army; he retains many by hopes and promises; but really aims at possessing everything belonging to everybody. To this man has the city been delivered up, full of supplies, and without a garrison. What is there that you may not dread from one who regards those temples and houses not as his country, but as his prey? What he designs to do however, or by what means, I know not, without a senate, and without magistrates: he cannot so much as pretend to any public motive. But where shall we be able to raise ourselves up again? or when? having, as you must perceive, a most ungeneral-like commander, who did not even know the circumstances of Picenum<sup>a</sup>. How unadvised he is, the state of affairs testifies; for, to say nothing of the errors of the last ten years, what condition is not preferable to this flight? Nor do I now understand what are his intentions; and I do not cease in my letters to inquire. It is plain that nothing can be more timid, nothing more confused: so that I see no protection, for the sake of which he was kept near the city; nor any place or situation for protection. All hope is placed in two legions that are invidiously retained<sup>b</sup>, and ill-affected. For the new recruits are hitherto raised against their inclination, and determined not to fight. The time for making conditions is lost. What is likely to happen I do not see. It has been committed by us, or at least by our leader, to go out of harbour without our rudders, and give ourselves up to the storm. I am in doubt what I should do with our young Ciceros: I have sometimes thought of sending them into Greece. And with respect to Tullia and Terentia, when the approach of so many foreign troops comes across my mind, I dread everything: then again when I recollect Dolabella, I a little revive. I should wish you to consider what you think I ought to do; in the first place, for security; (for a different consideration is due to them and to myself;) then for my reputation, that I may not be blamed for choosing to let them be in Rome at a time when all honest people are leaving it. You also, and Peduceus, who has written to me, must take care what you do; for such is your reputation, that as much is required of you as of the greatest citizens. But about this you will see; as I wish you to consider about myself, and my concerns. It remains for me to beg that you will find out, as well as you are able, what is doing, and will write me word: also what you can ascertain by conjecture, which I particularly look for from you. For, while everybody relates what is done, from you I expect what is going to be done. "The best prophet is one who guesses well?" Pardon my loquaciousness; which both affords me some relief while I am writing to you, and calls forth your letters<sup>c</sup>.

I could not at first understand the enigma of the Oppii of Velia<sup>d</sup>; for it is more obscure than

Plato's doctrine of numbers<sup>e</sup>. But I now understand your meaning; for you call the Oppii the Juices<sup>f</sup> of Velia. This puzzled me a long time. But this being made out, the rest was clear, and agreed with Terentia's account. I saw L. Caesar at Minturnæ the morning of the 25th of January with most extravagant instructions; a mere man of straw; so that he seems to me to have done it in mockery, to deliver to him instructions of such importance. Unless perhaps he did not deliver them, and this man caught hold of some expressions, which he pretended were instructions. Labienus, whom I look upon as a great man, came to Theanum the 23d; there he met Pompeius and the consuls. When I know certainly what was said and done, I will inform you. Pompeius went from Theanum towards Larinum the 24th. That day he remained at Venafrum. Labienus seems to have brought us a little encouragement. But I have nothing yet to tell you from this quarter. I rather wait to hear what news is brought thither; how he bears this conduct of Labienus; what Domitius is doing among the Marsi, or Thermus at Iguvium, or P. Attius at Cingulum<sup>g</sup>; how the people in the city are disposed; and what is your opinion of the future. Upon these subjects I should wish often to hear from you, and what you think best to be done about the ladies, and what you mean to do yourself. If I were writing with my own hand, I should send you a longer letter: but I employ an amanuensis on account of a weakness in my eyes.

LETTER XIV.

I SEND this on the 27th of January, on my way from Cales to Capua, having still a slight inflammation of the eyes. L. Caesar delivered Caesar's despatch to Pompeius on the 25th, while he was with the consuls at Theanum. The terms were approved, with this reserve, that he should withdraw his garrisons from those places which he had occupied beyond the limits of his province. If he did this, it was replied that we would return to the city, and conclude the business through the senate. I hope that we are at peace even at this present. For he begins to repent of his madness, and our general of his forces<sup>h</sup>. Pompeius wished me to go to Capua, and to forward the levies; in which the Campanian settlers are not very ready to engage. Pompeius has very conveniently distributed Caesar's gladiators, which are at Capua, and about whom I had before sent you a wrong account from Torquatus's letters. Two are sent to each family. There were 500 of them in the schools. It was said they were going to make an insurrection: so that in this respect the republic has been well provided in that part of Rome known by the name of Velia.

<sup>e</sup> This doctrine of numbers was derived from Pythagoras, and is indeed most obscure. Plato has introduced it in his "Timæus," and in some other parts of his works.

<sup>f</sup> I have thought it best to give this, which I conceive to be the meaning of the Latin succones, derived from succus, "succus," or "juice." There is an instance of a similar enigma on the name of Philothina. [See book vi. letter 3.] Of the Oppii see book viii. letter 7, note <sup>g</sup>.

aided for. Respecting our ladies, amongst whom is your sister, pray consider how far it is reputable for us that they should remain at Rome, when all other ladies of any respect have left it. I have before written to you, and have written to them about it. I should wish you to encourage their departure; especially as I have estates on the seacoast, where I preside, in which they may be accommodated as occasion offers. For if offence is taken at my conduct, it arises from my son-in-law; for which I ought not to be responsible: but this is something more, that our ladies should have continued at Rome after all the others. I should be glad to know what you yourself, and Sextus, think about going away; and what is your opinion of the whole state of affairs. For my own part, I do not cease to recommend peace; which, even if it is unequitable, is preferable to the most equitable. But this as fortune shall ordain.

LETTER XV.

SINCE my departure from the city, I have suffered no day to pass without writing something to you; not that I had much to say, but that I might write you in my absence. For, when I cannot write in person, nothing is more agreeable to me.

Upon my arrival at Capua on the 27th, the day previous to my writing this, I met the consuls, many of our order; all of whom wished that I should withdraw his garrisons, and abide by the terms he had offered. Favonius alone objected to admitting any conditions imposed by him; he was not attended to in the council.

Cato thinks it now better to submit than to insist. He says however that he wishes to be present in the senate, when the terms are debated, if I should be induced to withdraw his garrisons. Before he does not care to go into Sicily, where his presence is greatly wanted; but is desirous of being in the senate, which I fear may be prejudicial to me also, whom the senate appointed by name immediately into Sicily to succeed Puffanus, so to go without Cato, and conceive that his assistance and weight in the senate is of great importance. Thus the business devolves upon me, who is sent before with a command into Sicily.

There is a great difference of opinion in consultations. Most think that Cæsar will not consent to the conditions, and that these requirements were interposed by him only to interrupt necessary preparations for war. But I expect that I will withdraw his garrisons: for if he is consul, he will gain his purpose, and will depart with less guilt than that with which he has departed.

But a severe blow must be sustained; for I am shamefully unprepared both in men and in money. The whole of which, whether belonging to individuals in the city, or to the public in the country, is left for him. Pompeius is gone to Sicily with troops of Attius, and has taken Labienus with him. I want your opinion upon these matters. I wish to retire immediately to Formiæ.

W of the senators.

LETTER XVI.

I IMAGINE I have received all your letters; the first irregularly, the rest in the order in which Terentia sent them. About Cæsar's proposals, and Labienus's arrival, and the replies of the consuls and of Pompeius, I have written to you in a letter from Capua of the 28th, and have besides thrown together several things in the same letter. We have now two subjects of expectation; one, what Cæsar will determine when he has received the answer delivered to L. Cæsar; the other, what Pompeius is doing, who sends me word that in a few days he shall have an army on which he can depend; and he holds out the hope that, if he gets into the country of Picenum, we may return again to Rome. He has with him Labienus, who speaks confidently of the weakness of Cæsar's forces. His arrival is a great source of encouragement to our Cnæus. I have been desired by the consuls to be at Capua the 5th of February. I set out from Capua to go to Formiæ the 30th of January; and the same day having received your letter at Cales about three in the afternoon, I have immediately set down to answer it. I agree with you about Terentia and Tullia, to whom I had written referring them to you. If they are not already set out, there is no occasion for their removing till we see what the situation of things may be.

LETTER XVII.

YOUR letter is most acceptable and agreeable to me. I thought of transporting the boys into Greece, at a time when the quitting Italy seemed necessary: for if I should go to Spain this would not be equally suitable for them. I think you and Sextus may even now very well remain in Rome; for you have no reason to be friends with our Pompeius,—since nobody ever withdrew so much from the city garrison. You see that I can still joke with you. You must already be acquainted with the answer which L. Cæsar brings back from Pompeius, and the letter he bears from him to Cæsar; for it is written and delivered with the view of being made public. I have in my own mind found fault with Pompeius, who, though he writes so well, should have left to Sestius an affair of such consequence, which was to go into everybody's hands. Accordingly, I never read anything more Sestian. It may, however, be seen by Pompeius's letter, that nothing is refused to Cæsar; but everything that he can demand is abundantly granted,—which he must be mad if he does not accept, especially as the demand is most unreasonable: for who are you that say, "if Pompeius goes into Spain," and "if he dismisses his garrisons?" Yet this is granted; though not so honourably now, when the republic has been violated and invaded by arms, as if he had formerly obtained the acknowledgment of his eligibility. Yet I doubt if even this will satisfy him. For when he had delivered his proposals to L. Cæsar, he should have waited more quietly for the answer; instead of which he is reported to be particularly x The joke consists in giving the name of garrison to the senators and others who quitted Rome.

y More indicative of Sestius's bad style.

active. Trebatius sends me word, that he was desired by Cæsar to write to me the 22d of January, requesting me to come to Rome, and saying that I could not do him a greater favour. Upon all this he largely dilated. I understood, by reckoning up the days, that as soon as Cæsar had heard of my departure he began to be uneasy, from the apprehension that we<sup>a</sup> might all be absent. I do not doubt, therefore, of his having written likewise to Piso, and to Servius. I am rather surprised that he should not have written to me himself, or should not have applied to me through Dolabella or Cælius; not that I have any objection to Trebatius's writing, of whose affection I am well persuaded. I wrote word back to Trebatius (for I did not care to write to Cæsar, as he had not written to me), that it could not very well be done at this time,—but that I was at one of my farms, and had taken no part in raising troops or any other business: and I intend to maintain this posture as long as any hope remains. But if war breaks out, I shall not be wanting to my duty or to my dignity, having first sent the boys into Greece. For I perceive that every part of Italy will be involved in the contest,—so great is the mischief excited partly by wicked, partly by jealous citizens. But in a few days it will be understood, from the manner in which he receives our answer, how things are likely to go. Then, if we are to have war, I will write to you more at length; but if even a truce is agreed upon, I shall hope to see you myself. This 2d of February, on which day I write in Formianum, being just returned from Capua, I am expecting the ladies, though I had written to them by your advice to desire they would remain in Rome; but I hear there has been a great alarm in the city. I mean to be at Capua the 5th of February, as the consuls desired. Whatever intelligence is brought hither from Pompeius I will immediately write to inform you; and I shall expect to hear from you upon these affairs.

LETTER XVIII.

ON the 2d of February the ladies arrived at Formiæ, and brought an account of your attention and great kindness to them. I have thought it best that they should remain in Formianum along with the young Ciceros, till I knew whether we were to have a disgraceful peace or a wretched war. I am going with my brother to the consuls at Capua the 3d of February, on which day I write; for we were desired to be there the 5th. Pompeius's answer is said to be liked by the people, and approved by the assembly. I had supposed it would be so. If he<sup>a</sup> rejects this, he will lose his estimation; if he accepts it,—<sup>b</sup> "Which then," you will say, "do you prefer?" I would answer you if I knew how well we were prepared. It was reported here that Cassius had been driven from Ancon, and that the place was in the possession of our people. If a war takes place, this may be an advantageous circumstance. They say that Cæsar, at the very time when Lucius Cæsar was sent with proposals of peace, was nevertheless eagerly raising recruits, occupying different posts, and securing himself with garrisons. O the wicked robber! O disgrace to the republic, scarcely to be compensated by any peace. But let us cease to complain, and bend to the times, and go with Pompeius into Spain. This is what I wish for in this sad state; since we have, without any pretence, refused to let the republic see him a second time consul<sup>c</sup>. But enough of this. I forgot before to write to you about Dionysius; but it was my determination to wait for Cæsar's answer,—that in case I should return to the city he might wait for me there, or if that should be put off then I might send for him. I say nothing of what he ought to do in the event of my flight, or what becomes a learned and friendly man, especially when he had been asked. But this I must not require too rigidly from Greece. You will take care, however, if it is necessary to summon him (which I should be sorry for) that I may not trouble him against his inclination. My brother Quintus is anxious to pay what he owes you through Egnatius; and there is no want of inclination on Egnatius's part, nor any want of funds: but the times being such that Q. Titinius, who has been a great deal with me, has not enough to defray his expenses on the road, and has informed his debtors that they must continue the same interest<sup>d</sup>; that L. Ligus also is said to have done the same; and that Quintus has at present no money in his house, and can neither get any from Egnatius nor borrow anywhere: he is surprised that you should have no regard for this general embarrassment. And I, whilst I observe that precept falsely attributed to Hesiod (for so it is supposed), to pronounce no judgment till you have heard both sides, especially against you, whom I never knew to do anything unadvisedly; yet I am moved by his complaint: at all events I wished you to be acquainted with it.

LETTER XIX.

I HAVE nothing to tell you: nay, a letter which I had written I have not sent,—for it was full of good hopes; as I had been informed of the disposition of the assembly, and imagined that Cæsar would abide by the terms, especially as they were his own. Behold then on the morning of the 4th of February I received your letter, and that of Philotimus, of Furnius, and of Curio to Furnius, in which he ridicules L. Cæsar's embassy. I feel quite overwhelmed, and know not what resolution to form. Yet it is not for myself that I care; but I am at a loss what to do about the boys. I write this, however, on my way to Capua, that I may more readily learn the state of Pompeius's affairs.

LETTER XX.

THE time itself makes me little disposed to say much; for I despair of peace, and our friends make no provision for war. You can imagine <sup>c</sup> Cæsar's eligibility having been sanctioned by law, there was no longer any pretence to oppose it.

othing weaker than these consuls; by whose rections I came to Capua yesterday in a violent in, with the hope of hearing what they had to opose, and of learning the state of our preparations. They had not then arrived, but were coming oply and unprepared. Cneus was said to be at uceria, where he was to join some cohorts of the ttian legion, not very steady. But Cæsar, they y, is rushing on and almost at hand; not with e view of fighting,—for with whom should he ht! but to intercept our flight. For myself, I e ready to die with the rest in Italy; about ich I do not consult you. But if they go out Italy what should I do? The winter, the lictors ich attend me*, the improvidence and negligence our leaders, all tend to make me stay: the moes to flight are, my friendship with Cneus, the nmon cause of all honest men, the baseness of ning with a tyrant, who whether he will imitate alaria, or Pisistratus†, is uncertain. I should be d if you could resolve these difficulties, and ist me with your counsel,—though I imagine I must myself be already in perplexity where I are,—but yet as far as you may be able. If I rn anything new here to-day, you shall know it; the consuls will presently be here, as they ointed. I hope to hear from you every day. u will answer this as soon as you can. I left ladies and the young Ciceros in Formianum.

LETTER XXI.

Of our calamities you have earlier intelligence I, for they take their course from thence; and e is nothing good to be expected from hence. me to Capua the 5th of February, agreeably to order of the consuls. Lentulus arrived late in day; the other consul had not yet arrived on 7th: for on that day I left Capua and staid at s, from whence I send this the following day re it is light. I learned so much at Capua,— the consuls are quite inefficient, and that no s are raised. Those employed on the recruit-service dare not show their faces, as Cæsar is and; while our commander is nowhere, and nothing; so that the people will not enlist,— from want of inclination, but from want of uragement. But our Cneus (O wretched and dible state!), how is he quite sunk! He has pirit, no counsel, no forces, no exertion; to nothing of his shameful flight from the city, mid harangues in the towns, his ignorance not of his adversary's forces, but of his own. : is the meaning of this? On the 7th of ary, C. Cassius, tribune of the people, came pua with instructions from Pompeius to the is that they should go to Rome and take the money from the sacred treasury‡, and diately quit the city. Return to Rome? what guard? Then that they should go out ? with whose permission? The consul wrote back, that Pompeius himself must first occupy Picenum<sup>b</sup>. But that was already lost; which I knew, and nobody else, from Dolabella's letters. I had no doubt but that Cæsar would presently be in Apulia, and that our Cneus would be on board a ship. It is a great question what I should do. I should have no difficulty, if everything had not been conducted most disgracefully, while I was never consulted. But yet I would do what becomes me. Cæsar himself invites me to peace; but his letter is previous to his present impetuous career. Dolabella and Cælius assure me that my conduct is satisfactory to him. I am distracted with wonderful irresolution. Help me, if you can, with your advice; and at the same time, as far as you are able, provide for what may happen. In such a confused state of affairs I can write about nothing. I am expecting to hear from you.

LETTER XXII.

I PERCEIVE there is not a foot of ground in Italy that is not in Cæsar's power. Of Pompeius I know nothing; and unless he gets on board a ship, I fear he will be taken. What incredible speed! But as for this our general.—Yet I cannot without pain find fault with one for whom I am grieved and distressed. It is not without reason that you apprehend a slaughter; not that anything could be less calculated to secure the victory and authority of Cæsar; but I see by whose counsels he will act. May it turn out well! I apprehend it will be necessary to retire from these towns. I am at a loss what steps to take. You will do what you think best. Speak with Philotimus; and you will have Terentia on the 13th. What should I do? In what land, or what sea, should I follow him, whom I know not where to find? But how is it possible by land? And in what sea? Shall I then deliver myself up to Cæsar? Suppose I could do it with safety (and many people advise it), could I also do it with honour? Certainly not. What then? I want your advice, as usual. It is a difficulty which cannot be cleared up: yet tell me what occurs to you, and what you mean to do yourself.

LETTER XXIII.

On the 9th of February in the evening I received a letter from Philotimus informing me that Domitius had an army to be depended upon; and that it had been joined by the troops from Picenum under the conduct of Lentulus and Thermus; that Cæsar might be intercepted, and that he was afraid of it: that the spirits of honest men in Rome were raised; that the wicked were almost thunderstruck. I am afraid that this is but a dream: but, however, Philotimus's letter has quite revived M. Lepidus, L. Torquatus, and C. Cassius the tribune of the people, who are with me in the neighbourhood of Formiæ<sup>1</sup>. I wish it may not be more true, that we are all nearly prisoners; and that Pompeius is retiring from Italy; of whom (O bitter chance!) Cæsar is said to be in pursuit. Cæsar is pursuit of Pompeius? What? to kill him? O sad! And do we not all make a rampart of our bodies to oppose him? In this you also take an interest. But what can we do? We are completely conquered, overwhelmed, and taken. However, upon reading Philotimus's letter I have changed my resolution about the ladies, whom, as I told you, I was going to send back to Rome. But it occurred to me that it might occasion a good deal of talk, if I should seem already to have formed my judgment of the public cause: in despair of which the ladies went back as a step to my own return. Respecting myself, I agree with you, that I should not expose myself to a doubtful and hazardous flight, by which I can do no good to the republic, none to Pompeius, for whom I am willing to die with all devotion and readiness. I will therefore remain: though to live—]. You ask what people are doing here. All Capua, and all recruiting, is sunk in despair: the cause is considered as lost; everybody is running away; unless there be any prospect of Pompeius uniting those troops of Domitius with his own. But I suppose we shall know everything in two or three days. I have sent you a copy of Caesar's letter, as you desired. Many persons have assured me of his being very well pleased with the part I have taken. I am not sorry for this; whilst I shall continue, as I have hitherto done, to avoid anything inconsistent with my honour.

LETTER XXIV.

PHILOTIMUS's letter gave wonderful encouragement, not to me, but to those who were with me. The next day comes a letter to Cassius from his friend Lucretius at Capua, saying that Nigidius had arrived at Capua from Domitius, and reported that Vibullius was fleeing out of Picenum with a few soldiers to Cnæus, and that Caesar was immediately following him, while Domitius could not muster 3000 men. He added that the consuls had left Capua. I doubt not but Cnæus is trying to make his escape, if only he can effect it. I have, as you advise, no thought of fleeing away.

LETTER XXV.

AFTER I had despatched my letter to you full of sad news, but I fear too true, on the subject of Lucretius's letter to Cassius from Capua; Cephalio arrived, and brought from you a more cheerful letter, yet not written with your usual confidence. I can believe anything sooner than what you say, that Pompeius is at the head of an army. Nobody brings any intelligence of the kind hither, but

I understand this to allude to his destroying himself, if he could not live with credit, like what is repeatedly said, book iii. letters 9, 19, 23, under the affliction of his banishment; and there also it is rather implied than expressed, probably to avoid the ill omen of an open declaration in direct terms.

everything that is unpleasant. It is a wretched state. He has always been successful in a bad cause: in the best of causes he has failed. What can be said, but that he understood the one, which was easy enough, and did not understand the other? For the right administration of the republic is a difficult art. But I shall very soon know everything, and will immediately write to you.

LETTER XXVI.

I CANNOT say, as you do, "how often do I revive?" For it is only now that I a little revive, especially by the intelligence that is brought from Rome about Domitius, and the troops of the Picentians. These last two days everything has become more favourable, so that the preparations for flight are put off. Caesar's declaration, "if I find you here two days hence<sup>1</sup>," is discredited. The accounts of Domitius are good; those of Afranius excellent. Your friendly advice of keeping myself free from either party as long as I can, is very agreeable to me. When you add, that I must avoid the appearance of being inclined to a bad cause, I certainly may appear so; for I refused to take a lead in the civil contest while peace was in agitation: not that it was not right, but because that which was much more right had brought upon me the imputation of wrong<sup>1</sup>. I certainly did not wish to make an enemy of him<sup>2</sup> to whom Pompeius would offer a second consulate and a triumph: and in what terms? "for his most distinguished conduct." I know whom I should fear, and why. But if a war breaks out, as I see it will, I shall not be backward in taking my side. Terentia has written to you about the 20,000 sestertii (166*l.*). While I thought I should be moving about, I did not care to be troublesome to Dionysius; and I made no reply to your repeated assurance of his attachment, because I expected from day to day to be able to determine what was to be done. Now, as far as I see, the boys are likely to pass the winter in Formianum. Whether I shall be there too, I do not know; for if we go to war, I am resolved to join Pompeius. When I hear anything certain, I will take care to inform you. For my part I apprehend the foulest war; unless, as you know, some accident should occur on the side of Parthia<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>4</sup> The Romans having sustained a signal defeat by the Parthians, at the time of Crassus's death, became peculiarly alive to any danger that might arrive, and had already appointed Pompeius to go thither, [book vi. letter i.,] from whence it was hoped, that, in case of alarm from that quarter, the necessity of his absence might prevent a civil war from breaking out.

BOOK VIII.

LETTER I.

PRESENTLY after I had sent my letter to you, received one from Pompeius. It mostly related the transactions in Picenum, of which Vibullius sent him an account; and to the troops raised Domitius; all which is known to you. It did not, however, represent things in so favourable a light as Philotimus's letter. I would have sent the letter itself, but that my brother's servant in a hurry to set off. I will send it therefore tomorrow. But at the end of the letter is added Pompeius's own hand: "I think you should not go to Luceria: you can nowhere be safer." I understood this to signify, that he looked upon sea towns, and maritime coast*, as given up. I was not surprised that he, who had given the head† itself, should not spare the other members. I immediately wrote him word back by confidential attendant, that I did not consider I could be most in safety; but that if he desired me to go to Luceria on his own account, that of the republic, I would immediately go: I advised him to preserve the sea-coast, if he desired to be supplied with grain from the provinces. I saw that I was saying this to no purpose; but in the case of retaining the city formerly, so in the case of not relinquishing Italy, I wished to declare my opinion. For I perceive that pretensions are making to concentrate all the troops in Luceria, not because that place is tenable, but from thence, if we are pressed, we may have easy escape. You must not therefore be surprised, if I am unwilling to embark in a cause which has for its object neither peace nor victory, only a disgraceful and calamitous flight. I go; that, whatever issue chance may produce, I rather submit to it with those who are in good than appear to dissent from the good. Though I see that the city will presently be full of people in one sense, that is, of the luxurious and wealthy; and if these distant towns are crowded, it will overflow. I should be among their number, if I were not encumbered with these slaves. Nor should I be sorry to have Manius Volcatius, and Sergius Sulpitius, for companions; of whom none exceeds L. Domitius folly, or Appius Claudius in inconstancy. Claudius alone affects me, not by his authority, but by his kindness. For what authority can he have in this cause? who professed his fondness for me at a time when we were all afraid of him; since he is become afraid himself, thinks that I ought to be Caesar's enemy. I shall, therefore, go to Luceria; though he will not perhaps much pleased with my arrival; for I conceal my dislike of what has hitherto been done. If it were possible for me to sleep, I should be as well countenanced by the example of those who were going to Rome, as by that of those who, finding a whit better, staid away.

should not molest you with such long letters: if you are under the influence of the same cause, I wish you would make the same return.

LETTER II.

I AM obliged to you on every account; both for telling me what you had heard; and for not giving credit to what was inconsistent with my usual correctness; and for giving me your own opinion. I wrote one letter to Cæsar from Capua, in reply to what he had said to me about his gladiators‡. It was short, but expressive of kindness; not only without reproach, but even with great praise, of Pompeius. For so that purpose of my letter required, wherein I exhorted him to a reconciliation. If he has communicated this, he is welcome to publish it. I have written a second letter, the same day that I write this. I could not do otherwise, considering that he had himself written to me, and likewise Balbus. I send you a copy of my letter, and believe you will find in it nothing to blame: if there should be anything, show me how I could avoid it. "Do not write at all," you will say. How will this enable one to escape those who shall please to invent? However, I will do so as far as possible. When you recall me to the recollection of what I have done, and said, and written, you act indeed a friendly part, for which I thank you; but you seem to me to judge differently from myself what is honourable and becoming for me in this cause. For, in my opinion, nothing was ever done, in any country, by any leader and head of a state, more disgracefully than by our friend; whose condition I sincerely lament. He has deserted the city, that is, his country, for which, and in which, it had been glorious to die. You appear to me not to see the magnitude of this calamity; for you remain still in your own house. But you cannot remain there without the leave of the most abandoned men. Can anything be more wretched, more disgraceful than this? We wander about like beggars with our wives and children. We have placed all our hopes in the life of one man, who is every year dangerously ill; and are not driven, but called, out of our country; which we have left, not to be preserved till our return, but to be plundered and burned; so many are there in the same situation with myself, not in their villas, not in their gardens, not even in the city; or if they are now, they will not be there long. In the mean time I must not remain even at Capua, but at Luceria. And we must now relinquish the sea-coast, and wait for Afranius and Petreius; for Labienus has lost his dignity. Here you will apply to me the proverb, "What you give, that you must bear." I say nothing of myself; I leave that to others. But what dignity is there here? You, and all respectable people, are, and will continue, at your own homes. But before, who did not present himself to me? And now, who comes to this war? for so it must now be called. Vibullius has already done great things. You will know what this is from Pompeius's letter; in which observe the place that is scored. You will see what Vibullius's own opinion is of our Cæsus. But whither does this discourse lead? I am ready to sacrifice my life for Pompeius; there is nobody for whom I have a greater regard: yet not so, that I think all hope of saving the republic depends upon him alone; for you give me to understand, something differently from what you used to do, that even if he should retire from Italy, you think I ought to retire with him: which seems to me advisable neither for the republic nor for my children, and, moreover, neither right nor honourable. "What then? Will you be able to support the sight of a tyrant?" As if it signified whether I saw him, or only heard of him; or as if I could look for a higher authority than Socrates; who, when there were thirty tyrants, did not set his foot beyond the gate*. But I have besides a special reason for staying; about which I shall hope at some time to talk to you†. I write this, the 17th of February, by the same lamp with which I have burned your letter‡; and am going immediately from Formiæ to Pompeius: if it were to treat of peace, I might be of some consideration; if of war, what part can I take?

LETTER III.

IN the anxiety occasioned by this critical and wretched state of affairs, while I have no means of consulting with you in person, yet I wish to avail myself of your judgment. The whole question is this: if Pompeius should quit Italy, as I imagine he will, what you think I ought to do; and that you may the more easily give me your opinion, I will shortly explain what occurs to me on both sides. My great obligations to Pompeius in promoting my restoration, the intimacy between us, and the cause of the republic itself, induce me to think that I ought to unite with him, whether in counsel or in fortune. Added to which, if I remain, and desert that assemblage of the best and most distinguished citizens, I must fall under the dominion of one man; who, though in many respects he shows himself to be friendly to me, (and that he might be so I have, as you know, long since provided, in apprehension of this storm which hangs over us,) yet we must take into consideration both the degree of credit that is to be given to his professions, and, if it should be clear that he will indeed be friendly to me, whether it becomes a brave man, and a good citizen, to remain in that city, in which he has enjoyed the highest honours and appointments, has conducted the greatest affairs, and held the sovereign priesthood, without being any longer his own master, and with the possibility of incurring danger, and perhaps some disgrace, if ever Pompeius should restore the republic. This is what may be said on one side. See now what may be said on the other. Nothing has been done by our Pompeius wisely, nothing nobly, and, I may add, nothing but what was contrary to my own opinion and authority. I omit those old errors of cherishing, raising, and arming Cæsar against the republic; that it was he who got laws to be passed by violence, and contrary to the auspices; he that added the further Gaul to his command; he that is the son-in-law; he that was sager at the adoption of P. Clodius; he that was more earnest in my recall than in preventing my exile; he that extended the period of Cæsar's government; he that was on every occasion the advocate of Cæsar in his absence; and even in his third consulate, after he began to be the protector of the republic, exerted himself to obtain the consent of the ten tribunes to his eligibility during his absence; which he afterwards ratified by a certain law of his own; and on the 1st of March opposed the consul Marcus Marcellus, who would have put an end to the Gallic provinces*. But, to say nothing of these matters, what can be more disgraceful, what more inconsiderate, than this retreat from the city, or rather this base flight? What conditions were not preferable to the desertion of one's country? The conditions were bad, I grant; but could anything be worse than this? "But he will recover the republic." When? Or what preparations are there to encourage such a hope? Is not the country of Picenum lost? Is not the road left open to the city? Is not all the wealth of the metropolis, both public and private, surrendered to the adversary? In short, there is no party, no power, no place, where those may rally who wish well to the republic. Apulia is chosen, the most uninhabited part of Italy, and the most remote from the irruption of this war: flight, and convenience of the sea-coast, appear to be the first objects in this despondency. I took charge of Capua against my will; not that I disliked that office, but because there was no party to act with, none that showed any public sorrow, or any declared private sorrow: there was some among good men, but this was in a quiet way, as usual, and as I might have felt myself; the mob and all the weaker sort were inclined to the other side, and many were desirous of some change. I told Pompeius that I could undertake nothing without troops, and without money. I have therefore had nothing at all to do; for I saw from the first, that nothing was aimed at besides escape. If I now pursue this object, whither should I go? Certainly not with him: for when I had set out to join him, I understood that Cæsar was in those parts, so that I could not safely get to Luceria. I must sail then by the Mediterranean sea, with no certain course, and in the depth of winter. Besides, should I go with my brother, or without him? or with my son? or how? Either way I shall have great difficulty, and great anxiety. And what violence will he commit against me and my fortunes in my absence! Greater than against those of other people; because he may think that in his attacks upon me he will be supported by some degree of popularity. Besides, how troublesome is it to carry with me these fetters, these laurelled fasces I mean, out of Italy! And supposing the sea to be tranquil, what place would be safe for me, before I could reach him? I neither know what road I should take, nor whither I should go. But if I remain, and there be any place for me in these parts, I shall do no more than Philippus, than L. Flaccus, than Q. Mucius, did at the time of Cinna's domination, however it turned out to the last of them<sup>b</sup>; who used nevertheless to say that he foresaw what must be the consequence; but that he referred this, to coming up in arms against his country. Thrasylulus<sup>c</sup> judged otherwise, and perhaps better. But there is some reason in the conduct and sentiments of Mucius, as well as in those of Thrasylulus; both in bending to the times, when it is necessary, and not letting slip an opportunity when it is offered. But in this very consideration these same fasces create an embarrassment. For supposing him to be friendly towards me, which is uncertain; but supposing it, will offer me a triumph<sup>d</sup>. Would it be more generous not to accept it; or more invidious to accept it? This, you say, is a difficult and inextricable point. Yet explained it must be. "But how can it be done?" Now, that you may not suppose I incline to remain, because I have dwelt longer on that side; it may be, as it happens in many cases, that there is more pleading on one side, more truth on the other. Therefore I should be glad if you would give me your opinion, as upon a point of great moment, on which I would exercise an unbiassed judgment. I have a vessel ready for me, both at Caieta and at Brundisium. Whilst in writing this account of my own concerns by night in the neighbourhood of Cales, there have arrived messengers with letters stating that Cæsar is on his way to Corfinium, and that Domitius is at Corfinium with a steady army eager to engage. I cannot think that our Cæsar will be so negligent to desert Domitius; though he had sent on before with two cohorts to Brundisium, and had written to the consuls to desire that one of them would conduct into Sicily the legion which had been raised by Faustus. But it will be disastrous to desert Domitius, when he is imploring assistance. I have some hope, but not much, though it is generally believed in these parts.)

* They who now content themselves with staying at home, formerly professed their readiness to support the cause of the republic.

Afranius may have had an engagement with Pomponius in the Pyrenean mountains, that Trebonius has been repulsed, and that your friend Julius has come over with his troops; and in short, that Afranius is approaching with a strong force. If this is so, we shall perhaps remain in suspense. As it was uncertain what road Cæsar would take, and it was expected that he would go either to Capua or to Luceria, I sent Leptus to Capua with a letter, and returned to Forth, that I might not fall in with him. I wished to let you know this; and have written in a more composed state of mind than I did lately, not wishing to interpose any judgment of my own, but requesting yours.

<sup>a</sup> Mucius remained in the city, and was killed. Thrasylulus came against his country, Athens, to free it from the dominion of the thirty tyrants. See book vii., in which his petition for a triumph is briefly mentioned.

LETTER IV.

YOUR Dionysius, for so I must call him, not mine, (who was pretty well known to me, though I chose rather to rely upon your judgment than my own,) without any regard to your testimony concerning him, which had so often been given me, has displayed his insolence in this state of fortune in which he supposed me to be. However, as far as human prudence can effect, I hope to regulate the course of events with some discretion. But what honour, what attention, has not been shown him! What commendation to others in favour of a contemptible man! I have even chosen to have my judgment impeached by my brother Quintus, and generally by all people, rather than not extol him by my praises: and have taken upon myself part of the trouble of teaching the young Ciceros, instead of applying to any other master. Ye gods! what letters have I written to him! how full of honour! how full of affection! You would suppose I was inviting Diczæarchus, or Aristoxenes; not one who was such a prattler, and so little fit to teach. "But he has a good memory<sup>e</sup>." He shall find that I have a better<sup>f</sup>. He has replied to my letters in such a manner, as I never did to any one whose cause I declined. For I always added, "if it is in my power;" "if I am not prevented by some former engagement." I never gave to any client, however humble, mean, or guilty, so abrupt a refusal, as he has given me. He has positively, and without qualification, cut off all communication. I never knew an instance of greater ingratitude; in which vice is included everything that is bad. But more than enough on this subject. I have got a vessel ready: but wait for a letter from you, that I may know what answer it brings to my consultation. You are apprised of C. Attius Pelignus having opened the gates of Sulmo to Antonius, though he had with him five cohorts; and that Q. Lucretius has fled from thence. Our Cæsar is gone to Brundisium, and deserted the cause. It is all over.

LETTER V.

BEFORE it was light on the 22d, I wrote to you about Dionysius; and on the evening of the same day Dionysius himself came to me, moved, as I suspect, by your authority. For how can I think otherwise? Though it is true that after having done anything intemperately, he often repents. But he never was more determined than on this occasion. For what I mentioned to you, I afterwards had confirmed to me, that before he had got three miles "he began to toss his horns into the air with anger." He uttered, I mean, many imprecations, to fall, as they say, upon his own head. But observe my lenity: I put into the same packet with your letter one directed to him. This I wish to have returned to me; and for this special purpose I have sent Pollux, one of my couriers, to Rome; and have written to you to beg that, if it should have been delivered to you, you would take care to send it back, that it may not come to his hands. If there was any news, I would have written. I am anxious to hear about Corfinium<sup>5</sup>, where the fate of the republic is to be decided. I shall be obliged to you to forward the packet, which is addressed to Des. M. Curius<sup>6</sup>, and to recommend Tiro to Curius, that he may advance to him, as I have requested, what may be necessary for his expenses.

LETTER VI.

AFTER I had sealed the letter which I intended to send in the night, (as in fact I did, for I wrote it in the evening,) C. Sossius, the prætor, came to Formianum to my neighbour M. Lepidus, to whom he had been questor; and brought him a copy of Pompeius's letter to the consul, as follows.

"I have received a letter from L. Domitius dated the 17th of February, of which I inclose a copy. Now, though I should not write, yet I am sure you see of your own accord, of what importance it is to the republic, that all the forces should be collected as soon as possible into one place. If therefore you think well of it, you will take care to join me as soon as you can; leaving at Capua what you consider will be a sufficient guard." Then he subjoined the copy of Domitius's letter, which I sent you yesterday. Good gods! What horror do I feel! How anxious am I about the issue? I hope however that the name of Pompeius will be considerable, and considerable also the terror of his approach. I hope also, as nothing has yet hurt us, * * * I have just heard that your ague has left you. May I die if I am not as much pleased as if it had been my own case. Tell Pilia that it is not right for her to keep hers any longer<sup>1</sup>; and that it is unbecoming the usual harmony between you. I hear that my Tiro has been freed from another illness of the same kind. I find he has borrowed elsewhere for his expenses<sup>2</sup>. But I had requested Curius, in case he should want anything. I hope it is Tiro's modesty, rather than Curius's want of liberality, that is in fault.

LETTER VII.

THE only thing remaining to complete the disgrace of our friend is, that he should refuse to assist Domitius. Nobody doubts but he will come to his relief. For my own part, I think he will not. "Will he desert then such a citizen, and those who, you know, are with him? Especially when he is at the head of thirty cohorts?" Unless I am totally mistaken, he will desert them. He is inconceivably alarmed, and thinks of nothing but escaping. He it is (for I see what is your opinion) whom you think I ought to accompany. But while I have somebody to avoid, I have nobody to follow. For when you praise and extol my profession of choosing rather to be conquered with Pompeius, than to conquer with the opposite party. I do indeed choose it; but it is with Pompeius such as he then was, or such as I believed him to be: but with him, who runs away before he knows whom he has to fear, or which way he should go; who has betrayed our cause, left his country, and is going to leave Italy; with him if I chose rather to be conquered, it has happened already, I am conquered. As to what remains, I cannot bear to look at a state of things which I never apprehended; nor indeed to look at him<sup>1</sup>, on whose account I must lose not only my friends, but my very self. I have written to Philotimus to procure the money for my journey, either from the mint (for nobody pays), or from the Oppii, your partners<sup>2</sup>. I shall leave to you the care of what else is requisite<sup>3</sup>.

LETTER VIII.

O SHAMEFUL business! and therefore miserable! For I hold that whatever is base, that, or rather that only, is miserable. He had fostered Cæsar; he had suddenly begun to fear him; he had agreed to no condition of peace; had made no preparation for war; had deserted the city; had lost Picenum by his negligence; had thrust himself into Apulia; was going into Greece; was leaving us all without speaking to us, or consulting us upon so important and extraordinary a resolution. Then presently comes Demetrius's letter to him, his to the consuls. A sense of honour seemed to flash before his eyes, and I supposed him to have exclaimed with becoming manliness, "In this, which is my duty, let people attempt and plot what they will against me; for right is on my side<sup>4</sup>." But he, bidding a long farewell to honour, goes on to Brundisium. It is reported, that Domitius, and they who were with him, when they heard it, surrendered. O grievous affair! I am prevented by anguish from writing more to you. I look anxiously for a letter from you.

LETTER IX.

I LIKE exceedingly your advice, which is both honourable and suitable to the caution required in these times. Lepidus indeed (for we almost live together, which is very grateful to him) never approved of leaving Italy: Tullus<sup>5</sup> still less. For his letters are frequently brought to me from other people. But their opinion has less weight with me. They had never given so many pledges to the republic<sup>6</sup>. Your authority greatly influences

<sup>2</sup> So I venture to translate the word contubernales; for the Oppii being, as it appears, money-dealers, and living in one of Atticus's houses, may well be believed to have been connected in business with Cecilius, to whose property Atticus had succeeded. See book x. letter 15.

me. For it holds out the means both of recovering the time that remains, and of securing the present*. But what, I beseech you, can be more wretched than this: that the one should gain applause in a most foul cause; the other, odium in the very best: that the one should be esteemed the preserver of his enemies; the other, the deserter of his friends. And in truth, however I may love my friend Cæsar, as I do and ought, yet in this respect I cannot commend him, that he should not have come to the support of such people. If this is enough fear, what can be more disgraceful? or if, as some suppose, he thought that his own cause would be advanced by their destruction, what can be more iniquitous? But let us have done with this; let us augment our sorrow by repeating it. On the 24th in the evening the younger Balbus called on me on his way to the consul Lentulus; to whom he was hastening through by-ways, by command of Cæsar, with a letter, with instructions, with the promise of a provincial government if he could return to Rome. I do not think it possible to persuade him, unless they should have a personal interview. He said that Cæsar wished for nothing more, than to get up to Pompeius, which he would do, and to resume his friendship with him, which I do not believe. I even fear that all this policy may be directed against that one object of cruelty†. The elder Balbus indeed informs me, that Cæsar wishes nothing more than to live in security, while Pompeius retains his authority. I suppose you believe this! But while I am writing, Pompeius may already have reached Brundisium, he went lightly armed from Luceria before the onset. But this meteor‡ has dreadful vigilance, fitness, and diligence. What will be the issue I do not guess.

LETTER X.

PRONYSIUS having come to me contrary to my expectation, I spake to him with all civility, except the peculiarity of the times, and desired to let me know what were his intentions; that I did not require anything of him against his will. He replied that he was in uncertainty about his affairs; that some people did not pay; that from others the money was not yet due; with some else about his slaves: for which reasons he did not wish to be with us. I let him have his way, I dismissed him; as tutor to the young Ciceros, willingly; as an ungrateful man, not unwillingly. I wished you to know my opinion of his conduct.

LETTER XI.

SPECTING the great agitation of mind with which you suppose me to be affected; it is true, I, yet not so great as you may perhaps imagine. For every care becomes less, when either a solution is fixed, or when all consideration is past. We may still grieve; and that I do all day long: but while it is ineffectual, I fear I may

even disgrace my studies and learning. I waste therefore all my time in considering the excellence of that character which you thought I had accurately expressed in my treatise". Do you remember then that moderator of the state, to which I would refer everything? For it is thus, if I am not mistaken, that Scipio speaks in the fifth book: "For as the proper aim of the pilot is a favourable course; that of the physician, health; that of a general, victory: so is the happiness of his countrymen, of this moderator of the state: that they may live secure in wealth, rich in forces, abundant in glory, honourable in virtue: for I would have him the person to accomplish this greatest and best of works." This has at no time been duly considered by our Cæsar, and least of all on the present occasion. It is dominion that has been sought by both parties; not any endeavour to render the state happy and virtuous. Nor has he left the city because he was unable to defend it; nor Italy because he was driven out of it: but this was his purpose from the beginning, to move all lands and seas, to call up distant kings, to introduce savage nations armed against Italy, to raise the greatest armies. A dominion like that of Sylla has long since been his object, and many who are with him desire it. Think you that no agreement, no convention, could be made between them? Even yet it might: but it is not the aim of either to make us happy; both of them wish to oppose it. I have shortly exposed these matters at your request; for you wished me to give you my opinion of these calamities. I forewarn you therefore, my Atticus, not with the prophetic spirit of her<sup>1</sup> whom nobody believed; but anticipating by conjecture; "already in the great ocean," &c. Nearly in the same strain, I say, I may prophesy; so great a weight of evils hangs over us. And in one respect the condition of us, who remain at home, is worse than theirs who have passed over with Pompeius; inasmuch as they have only one to fear, whilst we have both. Why then did I stay behind? you will say. It may be either in obedience to you; or because I could not get up to him; or because this was more proper. I say, next summer you will see the wretched Italy trampled under foot, and shaken by the violence of both parties, who will collect together the slaves of every description. Nor is a proscription (which was the general subject of conversation at Luceria) so much to be dreaded, as the ruin of the whole country; so great will be the forces of both in this contest. I send you my opinion. But you expected perhaps some source of consolation: I can find none. Nothing can be more wretched, nothing more deplorable, nothing more disgraceful. You ask what Cæsar has written to me. What he has frequently said; that he was much pleased with my remaining quiet; and he begs me to continue so. The younger Balbus brings the same injunctions. He was on his way to the consul Lentulus with Cæsar's letter, and the promise of rewards, if he would return to Rome. But upon reckoning up the days, I think he will pass over before a meeting can take place. I wish you to be made acquainted with the meagreness of two letters which I have received from Pompeius, and my own full replies. I send you a copy of them. I am expecting the issue of this rapid march of Cæsar through Apulia to Brundisium. I wish it were anything like the Parthian incursions*. As soon as I hear anything, I will write to you. I should be glad if you would tell me what good people say. There are reported to be a great many in Rome. I am aware that you do not go into public; but you must necessarily hear a great deal. I remember your receiving a book, sent you by Demetrius Magnes, upon Concord. I should be glad if you would lend it to me. You see what subject I am considering.

Q. FABIVS came to me the 29th of January. He brings information that L. Domitius with his own eleven cohorts, and fourteen cohorts which Vibullius has brought up, is on his way to join me: that he had intended to leave Corfinium the 13th of February; and that C. Hirrus with five cohorts would follow. I am of opinion you should come to me at Luceria; for here I think you will be in the greatest safety.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

I RECEIVED your letter at Formiæ the 15th of February, by which I understood that the transactions in Picenum were much more favourable than had been represented to me; and it was with pleasure that I recognised the courage and diligence of Vibullius. On the coast, over which I have been placed, I have hitherto thought it right to have a ship in readiness: for what I hear, and what I apprehend, is of such a nature, as to make me think it my duty to follow whatever plan you should advise. Now, since by your authority and counsel I am in better hope, if you think it possible to maintain Tarracina and the sea-coast, I will continue there, although there are no garrisons in the towns. For there is nobody of condition in these parts, except M. Eppius, whom I have desired to remain at Minturnæ. He is an active and careful man. But L. Torquatus, who is a brave man, and in authority, is not at Formiæ: I imagine he is gone to you. I came to Capua, agreeably to your last instructions, the very day on which you left Teanum Sidicinum; for you had desired me, together with M. Cossidius the prætor, to take care of the affairs in that part. When I came thither, I found that T. Ampius was raising troops with great diligence, which were transferred to Libo, who had also great zeal and authority in the colony. I remained at Capua as long as the consuls; and came thither again the 5th of February, as the consuls had appointed. After being there three days, I came back to Formiæ. At present I am uncertain what is your intention, or what is your plan of conducting the war. If you think this coast should be maintained, as I think it may, there must be somebody to take the command: it possesses great convenience and respectability, and has in it many distinguished citizens. But if all our forces are to be collected into one place, I shall not hesitate to join you immediately; which I shall be very glad to do, as I told you the day I left the city. If I appear to anybody to have been backward in this business, I do not regard it, provided I do not appear so to you: yet if, as I perceive, war must be waged, I trust I shall easily satisfy everybody. I send to you M. Tullius, my confidential freed-man, by whom, if you think fit, you may write to me.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to M. Cicero, Imperator.

I HOPE you are well. I read your letter with great satisfaction, and recognised also your former spirit in support of the common safety. The consuls have joined the army which I have had in Apulia. I earnestly exhort you, by your distinguished and unceasing regard for the republic, to come to us, that we may by our united counsels afford help and assistance to this afflicted state. I think you should travel by the Appian road, and reach Brundisium quickly.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

WHEN I wrote the letter which was delivered to you at Canusium, I had no suspicion that you would cross the sea for the service of the republic: but was in great hope that we might in Italy either establish some agreement, which seemed to me very desirable, or with the highest dignity defend the republic. In the mean time, before my letter could have reached you, understanding from the instructions which you sent to the consuls by D. Lælius what was your intention, I did not wait till I should hear from you, but immediately set out, with my brother Quintus and our children, to join you in Apulia. When I came to Teanum Sidicinum, C. Messius your friend, and several others, informed me that Cæsar was on his way to Capua, and would stop at Esernia that very day. I was truly concerned, because if it were so, I considered not only that my road was intercepted, but that I was myself quite cut off from you. I therefore proceeded at that time to Cales, where I might remain till I should receive some certain information from Esernia about what I had heard. While I was at Cales there was brought to me a copy of the letter which you sent to the consul Lentulus, saying that you had received one from L. Domitius, the 17th of February, of which you subjoined a copy; and that it was of great importance to the republic, that all the forces should be collected into one place as soon as possible; and directing him to leave a sufficient guard at Capua. Upon reading this letter I was of the same opinion as everybody else, that you would proceed with all your forces to Corfinium. But as Cæsar had encamped before the town, I did not think it safe for me to go thither. While we remained in anxious expectation of the issue, we heard at one and the same time both what had happened at Corfinium, and that you had begun to make your way to Brundisium: and when I and my brother had determined to go to Brundisium, we were warned by many people, who came from Samnium and Apulia, to take care that we were not surprised by Cæsar; for that he had set out for the same place to which we were going, and would reach his destination quicker than we could. Upon which neither I, nor my brother, nor any of our friends, bought it right to run the risk of injuring not merely ourselves, but the republic, by our rashness; specially as we had little doubt but that, if even the road were safe, yet we should not now be able to overtake you. In the mean time I received your letter of the 20th of February from Canusium, in which you beg that we would come quickly to Brundisium. This I received on the 27th, when I did not doubt but you would already have arrived at Brundisium. The road seemed to be quite closed against us; and ourselves to be taken as completely as those who had gone to Corfinium: for I consider as taken, not only those who have fallen into the hands of armed people, but those likewise who are excluded from certain districts, and have come within the garrisons and posts of their enemies. In this state my first wish was, as I had always been with you, as I mentioned to you when I wanted to decline the command of Capua; which I did, not for the sake of avoiding trouble, but because I saw that the city was capable of being kept without an army, and I was willing to expose myself to the same accident, which I lament in the case of our brave friends. At the time when I was prevented from being with you, I should I could have been made acquainted with your signs: for it was impossible for me to guess them; as I should sooner have thought anything, than that this cause of the republic could not be maintained in Italy under your direction. I do not at all however to find fault with your determination; but I mourn over the fortune of the republic; nor do I the less believe you to have acted in good reason because I am unacquainted with your purpose. I am persuaded you remember it was always my opinion, first, respecting the maintaining peace, even upon unequal conditions; then respecting the city; for on the subject of which you never opened yourself to me. But I do assume to myself that my opinion ought to have prevailed: I adopted yours. And I did this, for the republic's sake, about which I despaired, as it now is, and incapable of being raised up out of a ruinous civil war; but I sought you, I wished to be with you, and will not omit an opportunity of it, should any present. In all this necessity I was well aware that I should not give satisfaction to such as were eager for fighting: for, in the first place, I professed that I wished nothing more than peace: not but I feared the same consequences as they did, but I esteemed even those more tolerable than a civil war. Then again, when the war was begun, when I found that commissions of peace were offered to you, and that you made an honourable and full reply to them, I followed my own determination, which I trusted, according to your usual kindness towards me, I could easily explain to your satisfaction. I recollect that I was one who, for my distinguished services to the republic, had been subjected to the most and most cruel sufferings; that I was one of whom if I had offended him, to whom even when we were in arms there was granted a second trial, and a most ample triumph, I should be exposed to the same persecution; since the acts of wicked men on my person seemed always to have something of popularity. And this I was forward to suspect, till it was openly threatened. We were obliged to surrender ourselves to Cæsar.

Nor did I so much dread it, if it were necessary; as I thought it prudent to avoid it, if it could be done with honour. You see shortly the motives by which I was actuated as long as there was any hope of peace. Circumstances have removed all power of doing anything further. But I have a ready answer for those who are dissatisfied with me: for I have been no more a friend to C. Cæsar than they; nor have they been more attached to the republic than I. The difference between us consists in this; that while they are excellent citizens, and I am not deficient in the same reputation, I preferred settling these disputes by treaty, which I understood to be your wish also; they by arms. And since this opinion has prevailed, I shall take care that neither the republic may lose the affection of a citizen, nor you that of a friend.

LETTER XII.

THE weakness of my eyes is become more troublesome even than it was before; I determined, however, to dictate this rather than send no letter at all by Gallus Fabius, who is so much attached to us both. Yesterday I wrote myself, as well as I was able, with a prophecy, which I wish may prove false. The occasion of this letter is, not only that I may let no day pass without writing to you, but, what is a juster reason, that I may beg you to employ a little portion of your time (and it will not cost you much) to let me thoroughly understand your sentiments. I am still at liberty to choose what course I should adopt. Nothing has been neglected which does not admit, not merely of a plausible, but a satisfactory excuse. For surely I have not done wrong in wishing to decline the proffered administration of Capua, that I might avoid any suspicion either of backwardness in raising troops or of treachery; nor, after the conditions of peace brought by L. Cæsar and Fabatus, in taking care not to offend him, to whom Pompeius, while they were both in arms, had offered the consulate and a triumph. Neither can anybody justly blame these last measures of not crossing the sea, which, though it was matter of consideration, yet it was not in my power to accomplish; nor ought I to have suspected such a step, especially as from Pompeius's own letter I concluded (and I perceive that you were of the same opinion) that he would go to support Domitius. And in truth I wanted a longer time to determine what was right, and what I ought to do. In the first place then, though you have given me generally your opinion on this subject, yet I should be glad if you would write to me more particularly. In the next place I wish you to look a little into futurity, and fancy to yourself the character I ought to support, and how you think I can be of most use to the republic,—whether there is any room for a pacific personage, or whether everything rests with the military. I, who measure everything by duty<sup>d</sup>, recollect, however, your advice<sup>e</sup>, which if I had followed I should not have felt the miseries of those times. I remember what you then recommended through Theophanes and Culeo, and I often recollected it with regret. Now then at least let me revert to that estimation of things which I formerly rejected, and consider not only what is glorious but a little also what is expedient. But I prescribe nothing; I wish you to give me exactly your own opinion. I should be glad also if you would find out as correctly as you can (and you will meet with persons through whom you may do it) what our friend Lentulus, what Domitius, is doing, or what he means to do; how they conduct themselves,—whether they accuse or are angry with anybody. With anybody, do I say? With Pompeius. Pompeius throws all the blame upon Domitius, as appears by his letter, of which I send you a copy. You will see after these matters; and, as I mentioned to you before, I should be obliged to you to send me the book which Demetrius Magnes presented to you upon Concord.

As I considered that, while our troops were dispersed, we could neither render any service to the republic nor defend ourselves,—therefore I wrote to L. Domitius first to come to me himself with his whole force, or if he doubted about himself, to send me the nineteen cohorts which were on their way to me from Picenum. What I feared has happened,—that Domitius was hemmed in, without being strong enough to form an encampment, because he had my nineteen cohorts and his own twelve distributed in three different towns, having placed part at Alba and part at Sulmo,—nor could he disengage them if he would. I am now, therefore, in the greatest anxiety. For I wish to relieve so many valuable men from the hazard of a siege, and am unable to go to their assistance,—for I do not think it safe to let these two legions be conducted thither,—out of which I have not been able to collect more than fourteen<sup>2</sup> cohorts, having sent a garrison to Brundisium, and not thinking that Canusium ought to be left unprotected in my absence. I sent word to D. Lælius that I hoped to have an increase of force, so that if you thought well of it one of you might join me; the other might go into Sicily with such troops as you have obtained at Capua and in the neighbourhood, together with those which have been raised by Faustus; that Domitius with his twelve cohorts should proceed to the same destination; that all the remaining forces should be collected at Brundisium, and from thence should be transported in ships to Dyrrachium. Now, since at this time I am no more able than you to go to the assistance of Domitius, I must leave him to extricate<sup>3</sup> himself through the mountains. I cannot suffer the enemy to attack these fourteen cohorts, which I have in a doubtful disposition, or to come up with me in my march: on which account I have thought it right (and I find that Marcellus, and the rest of our order<sup>4</sup> who are here, are of the same opinion) to conduct the force I have with me to Brundisium. I beg you to collect whatever soldiers you can, and to come to the same place as soon as possible. I think you may distribute among the men which you have with you the arms you were going to send me. You will confer a great service on the republic by transporting the supernumerary arms on beasts of burden to Brundisium. I should be glad if you would give notice to my people upon this subject. I have sent to the prætors P. Lupus and C. Coponius to join me, and to conduct to you what troops they possessed.

<sup>2</sup> The complete legions contained ten cohorts, each cohort being divided into three manipuli, and each manipulus into two centuries. Had the numbers therefore been complete, which they seldom were, the legion would have contained 6000 men.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

I AM surprised that you have not written to me, and that all information about the republic should come to me from others rather than from you. While our troops are dispersed it is impossible for us to be equal to our adversaries. With our forces united I hope we may be of service to the republic and to the common safety. When, therefore, you had determined, as Vibullius wrote me word, to leave Corfinium the 9th of February with the army, and to come to me, I wonder what should have caused you to change your mind. For the reason which Vibullius mentions is of little weight, that you had heard of Caesar's having left Firmum, and being arrived at Castrum Truentinum; for the nearer the enemy approached, the more expeditiously ought you to have acted, in order to join me before Caesar could obstruct your road or cut off the communication between us: therefore, I beg and entreat you again and again, as I have not ceased to do in my former letters, to come to Luceria on the earliest day, before Caesar can bring together into one place the forces which he proposed to collect, and separate us from each other: or if you meet with impediments from some who would save their own troops, at least it is reasonable that I should desire you would send me those cohorts which are come from Picenum and Canusinum, and have left their own fortunes.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

M. CALENIUS brought me your letter the 18th of February, in which you say that you mean to observe Caesar's motions, and if he should attempt to come towards me by the sea-coast that you will immediately join me in Samnium,—or if he should loiter about those parts that you are disposed to resist him, whenever he comes within your reach. I have a just sense of your spirit and courage in this determination; but we must take great care that our forces are not so divided as to render us unequal to our adversary, who has already a great many troops, and will shortly have more. For with your usual prudence you ought to consider not only how many cohorts Caesar can at present bring against you, but what numbers of cavalry and infantry he will in a short time collect. This is confirmed by a letter which I have received from Bussenius, in which he says, what I have heard also from others<sup>5</sup>, that Curio is collecting the urisons from Umbria and Tuscany, and proceeding to join Cæsar. If these forces should unite, part should be sent to Alba, part should come against you,—without fighting, but only defending ourselves in their quarters, you will be embarrassed, and unable alone to resist such numbers with your present force, so as to admit of your raging. For these reasons I strongly advise you come hither as soon as possible with your whole force. The consuls have determined to do the same. I sent you advice by Metuscius, that it is necessary to prevent my two legions from being brought to face Cæsar without the Picentine borders. You must not, therefore, be uneasy if I should hear of my retreating, in case Cæsar comes towards me,—as I think it right to provide against the embarrassment of being surrounded; I can neither form a camp, owing to the season of the year and the disposition of the soldiers, nor safely bring together the troops out of all the towns for fear of having my retreat cut off. I have reformed collected at Luceria not more than four cohorts. The consuls will either bring all the legions, or will go into Sicily: for it is expedient never to have a strong army with which we may upon breaking through the enemy, or else to possess ourselves of such countries in which we can end ourselves,—neither of which is at present the case; for Cæsar is already master of a great part of Italy, and his army is superior both in equipments and numbers to mine. We must, therefore, take care to pay the utmost attention to the republic. I beg you again and again to come here as soon as possible with all your forces. I may yet raise up the republic if we unite our efforts in conducting the business; but if we are divided we must be weak. Such is my ultimate opinion.

Since writing this, Sica has brought me your letter and instructions. Respecting your wish that I should go to you, I do not consider it possible for me to do it, because I have no great confidence in these legions.

Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

RECEIVED your letter the 17th of February, which you inform me that Cæsar has pitched his camp before Corfinium. What I supposed, and I am glad you, has happened,—that he does not at present to engage in battle with you; but that he will collect together all his forces and send you so as to prevent your joining me, and that those troops of the best citizens with these legions, whose disposition is doubtful,—which I am the more concerned at your account. I cannot sufficiently rely upon the disposition of soldiers whom I have with me to risk the fortune of the republic; nor have those who have been enrolled by the consuls out of the levies. Therefore try if by any means you can now manage to extricate yourself, that you may come hither as soon as possible before all your adversary's forces are united. For men cannot quickly arrive here from the levies,—and if they do, it does not escape you how little they can stand against veteran legions while they are so much as known to each other.

LETTER XIII.

THE hand-writing of a clerk will show you that my eyes are not yet well; and the same cause will make me short; though at present I have nothing to tell you. My only expectation is in the news from Brundisium. If Cæsar should have come up with our friend Cnæus, the hope of peace is very doubtful; but if he should have passed over first, there is danger of a destructive war. But do you perceive with what a man the republic has to do? how acute! how vigilant! how ready! If forsooth he puts nobody to death, and plunders nobody, he will be most loved by the very people who were most afraid of him. I have a good deal of conversation with the towns-people, and with those from the country; they care absolutely about nothing but their fields, and their pleasure-houses, and their pelf. See how things are changed. Him<sup>1</sup>, on whom they once relied, they fear; and they love this man<sup>2</sup>, whom they used to dread. I cannot without grief reflect upon the errors and misconduct of our party, through which this has happened. I told you what dangers I apprehended. I am in expectation of hearing from you.

LETTER XIV.

I AM afraid my daily letters must be troublesome to you, especially as I can send you no news, nor indeed find any new subject to write upon. And if I were expressly to send messengers to you about nothing at all, I should act absurdly; but when people are going, particularly my own servants, I cannot suffer them to go without writing something to you. Besides, believe me, I feel some relief in these miseries while I talk, as it were, with you; and still more when I read your letters. I think indeed there has been no time since this fight and trepidation, when this intercourse of letters could with more propriety be interrupted; as nothing new is heard at Rome; nor in these parts, which are two or three days nearer to Brundisium than you are. It is at Brundisium that all the struggle of this first season passes. I am distracted with anxiety about the event. But I shall know all before you; for I find that Cæsar set out from Corfinium on the afternoon of the same day on which Pompeius set out in the morning from Canusium, that is the 21st of February. But such is the manner of Cæsar's march, and with such allowances does he urge the speed of his soldiers, that I dread his getting to Brundisium sooner than is to be wished. You will say, "What good is there in anticipating the distress of such an event, which in three days you will know?" There is none indeed. But, as I said before, I love to converse with you. Besides, you must know that I begin to waver in my opinion, which seemed to be already fixed. For the authorities<sup>3</sup>, which you approve, are not satisfactory to me. For what have they ever done to distinguish themselves in the republic? or who expects from them anything praise-worthy? not that I mean to applaud those who have crossed the sea for the purpose of increasing the preparations for war; however intolerable may be the present state of affairs; for I see how great and how ruinous the war must be. But I am influenced by regard for an individual, to whom it seems due that I should be a companion in his flight, and an assistant in restoring the republic. "So often then do you change your mind?" I converse with you as with myself; and who is there but in a case of such moment argues variously with himself? at the same time I wish to elicit your opinion; that if it is still the same, I may be the more determined; if it is changed, that I may assent to it. It is of importance to the subject of my doubt, to know what Domitius will do, and what our friend Lentulus. We have various reports about Domitius; sometimes, that he is at Tibertum, or at Lepidus's house; or that Lepidus is gone with him to the city; which I find is not true; for Lepidus says that it is uncertain where he is gone, and that he does not know whether his object be to conceal himself, or to reach the sea. He is equally ignorant about his son. He adds, what is distressing, that a large sum of money, which Domitius had at Corfinium, has never been delivered to him. We hear nothing of Lentulus. I should be glad if you could find out these things, and let me know.

LETTER XV.

On the 3d of March, Ægypta delivered to me two letters from you; one an old one, dated February 26, which you mention to have given to Pinarius, whom I have not seen. In this you express your anxiety to know what has been done by Vibullius, who was sent on<sup>a</sup> before. But Cæsar has not so much as seen him. In another letter I perceive that you are aware of this. You desire also to know how I receive Cæsar on his return: but I mean to avoid him altogether. You mention besides, that you meditate a Hæmonian flight<sup>b</sup>, and a change of your life; which I think you must adopt: also that you are uncertain whether Domitius has his fascæ<sup>c</sup> with him; but as soon as you know, you will inform me. You have my reply to your first letter. There are two subsequent ones, both dated the 28th of February, which have plucked me from my former resolution<sup>d</sup>, in which, as I before wrote to you, I was already wavering. What you say, "that Jupiter himself forbids it," has no weight with me. For there is danger in displeasing either party: and the superiority is still uncertain, though the worst cause has the appear-

<sup>a</sup> Vibullius was of Pompeius's party, was taken by Cæsar at Corfinium, and thence despatched to Pompeius with proposals of peace, which the latter disregarding never sent back Vibullius at all.

<sup>b</sup> The text is probably corrupt. It appears to be copied from Atticus's own expression in allusion to some story that has been lost. It may be believed that he meant to signify a design of retiring into Epirus.

<sup>c</sup> Domitius had been nominated to succeed Cæsar in Gaul. If he had the fascæ carried before him, it would be a mark of his assuming the authority in opposition to Cæsar. His example would be valuable to Cicero, who was likewise encumbered with his lictors. See letter 1 of this book.

<sup>d</sup> Persuading him now to leave Italy, contrary to the determination he had once formed.

ance of being best provided. I am not moved either by the consuls, who are themselves more easily moved than a leaf or a feather. It is the consideration of my duty that distracts me, and has done from the beginning. It is certainly safer to remain; but is thought more honourable to cross the sea. At the same time I would rather may should think I had acted imprudently, than a few dishonourably. As to what you ask about Lepidus and Tullus; it is not doubted<sup>e</sup> but they will present themselves to Cæsar, and will go into the sea. Your last letter is dated the first of March, in which you wish for a meeting<sup>f</sup>, and do not despair of peace. But while I write this, I neither believe they will meet; nor, if they did, that Pompeius would agree to any terms. You seem to entertain no doubt of what I ought to do, provided the consuls should cross the sea: they certainly cross it, or as things are now, have already crossed. But observe, that, except Appius, there is scarcely anybody who has not a right to do so<sup>g</sup>. For they either have some command, as Pompeius, as Scipio, Setenas, Fannius, Voconius, Sestius, and the consuls themselves, who have by ancient custom the privilege of visiting all the provinces; or they are lieutenants under these. But I do not wish to argue the point. I see what is your opinion, and am pretty well satisfied on the subject of my duty. I would write more, if I could do it myself; I shall be better able two days hence. I send you a copy of Balbus Cornelius's letter, which I received the same day as yours, that you may pity my condition when you see me thus mocked<sup>h</sup>.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

UNDETAKE, I entreat you, Cicero, the care and consideration must becoming your high character, of bringing back again to their former harmony Cæsar and Pompeius, who have been torn asunder by the perfidy of certain persons. Believe me, Cæsar will not only put himself in your power, but will esteem it a great favour conferred upon him, if you apply yourself to this business. I should be glad if Pompeius would do the same; though I rather wish, than expect, that he can be brought to any terms at such a time. But when he has stopped his flight, and laid aside his fears, I shall begin not to despair of the influence your authority may have with him. Cæsar is pleased, and I am most particularly so, with your wishing my friend Lentulus the consul to remain here. For I have that regard for him, that I do not love Cæsar better. If he had suffered me to talk with him as I used to do, and had not wholly rejected my conversation, I should be less uneasy than I am. Do not imagine that at this time anybody is more vexed.

<sup>a</sup> I have interpreted this sentence as if the words sed dubitant were independent of illi, which latter word I conceive to be connected with Asturi sint. "People do not doubt but they will join Cæsar." For this interpretation of dubitant, see book iv. letter 3, note 1. Otherwise it appears very harsh to say that they did not themselves doubt but they should join him, &c.

an I, when I see him, whom I love more than myself, conducting himself in his consulate like a thing rather than a consul. But if he will be ruled by you, and will take my word about Cæsar, and spend the remaining part of his consulate in one; I shall begin to entertain hope, that by the commendation even of the senate, upon your authority and at his motion, Pompeius and Cæsar may be united. If this is accomplished, I shall think I have lived long enough. I am sure you must approve of Cæsar's whole conduct respecting Brundisium; as in such a business it could not terminate more favourably, than by being effected without bloodshed. I am glad you were pleased at the arrival of mine and your friend Balbus<sup>a</sup>. I that he has told you about Cæsar, or that Cæsar has written, I am persuaded, whatever turn affairs may take, he will prove to you by his conduct that he has written in great sincerity.

LETTER XVI.

EVERYTHING is ready for me, excepting a road to conduct me in secrecy and safety to the Adriatic. For I cannot take advantage of the sea here<sup>c</sup>, this season of the year. But how shall I get there, where my inclination leads me, and circumstances call me? For it is necessary to set out edily, that I may not meet with some obstacle stop me. Yet my inducement to go is not he<sup>d</sup> on one might suppose; whom I have long known to be a bad politician, and now find to be a bad general. It is not he therefore that induces me; but the talk of the world, of which I am informed by Philotimus. He says that I am reproached by all the principal people. Ye gods! by what principal people? By those who are running to meet, and to sell themselves to Cæsar? The towns salute him as a god. And they do not dissemble, as when they put up vows for Pompeius in his sickness: but whatever this Pisistratus<sup>a</sup> has not inflicted, is as much a subject of gratitude, as if he had prevented some other person from inflicting it. This man<sup>b</sup> they hope to propitiate; the other<sup>c</sup> they think exasperated. What greetings do you think are made from the towns? What honours? "They are afraid," you will say. I believe it; but they are more afraid of the other<sup>d</sup>. They are delighted with Cæsar's insidious clemency: they dread Pompeius's anger. The 850 judges<sup>e</sup>, who were particularly attached to our Cnæus, some of whom I see every day, dread certain threats of his at Luceria<sup>f</sup>. I ask again then, who are these principal people, who would drive me out, while they remain themselves at home? Nevertheless, whoever they are, "I respect the Trojans<sup>g</sup>." At the same time I know what I have to hope; and go to join one, who is better prepared to lay waste Italy than to conquer it; in short, whom I expect—indeed while I am writing this, March 2d, I am expecting to hear something from Brundisium. What something? How shamefully he<sup>h</sup> has run away from thence; and by what road this conqueror<sup>i</sup> returns, and whither. Which when I have ascertained, if he comes by the Appian road, I think of going to Arpinum.

LETTER I.

BEFORE you read this, I imagine I shall know has been done at Brundisium; for Cnæus is from Canusium the 22d of February, and writing the 6th of March, the 13th day afterwards<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time I am distracted the expectation of every hour; and am sure that no rumour even should yet have reached this silence is quite wonderful. But it is as idle to vex oneself about what must soon come. I am uneasy at not yet having been able to find out where our friend Lentulus, where he is. And I want to know, that I may more readily understand what they mean to whether they will join Pompeius; and, if so, at what way, or when they will go. I understand that the city is already full of the principal citizens, the original it is the 14th day, because the Romans, in computation of time, were accustomed to include the first and the last day.

and that Sosius and Lupus<sup>2</sup>, whom our Cnæus expected to be at Brundisium before him, are trying causes. From these parts numbers are going up. Even M. Lepidus, with whom I used to spend my day, thinks of going to-morrow. I shall however remain in Formianum, that I may receive the earlier intelligence; I then design to go to Arpinum; and thence to the Adriatic sea by the most unfrequented road, having first set aside or wholly dismissed my lictors. For I hear that many respectable people, who on this and former occasions have rendered good service to the republic, disapprove of my delay, and make many severe observations upon me in their convivial meetings. Let us give way then, and in order to show that we are good citizens, let us make war upon Italy by sea<sup>3</sup> and land: and let us once more light up against us the enmity of wicked men, which was just extinguished; and let us follow the counsels of Luccæus and Theophanes<sup>m</sup>. For Scipio either goes into Syria by his lot, or honourably attends his son-in-law<sup>n</sup>, or avoids the anger of Cæsar: the Marcelli, if they were not afraid of Cæsar's sword, would stay behind: Appius is influenced by the same apprehension, and some recent causes of enmity: besides him, and C. Cassius, the others are lieutenants; Faustus is proquestor: I am the only person at liberty to choose the course I shall take<sup>o</sup>. My brother will go with me; though it is not reasonable that he should share my fortunes on this occasion, which will more particularly expose him to Cæsar's displeasure; but I cannot prevail upon him to stay. We shall thus give to Pompeius what we owe him. Indeed nobody else moves me; neither the talk of good men, of whom there are none, nor the cause itself, which has been conducted timidly, and will be prosecuted wickedly<sup>p</sup>. To him, to him alone I give this, while he does not even ask it, but supports (as he says<sup>q</sup>) not his own cause, but that of the public. I shall be glad to know what you think about going to Epirus.

LETTER II.

THOUGH I am expecting a longer letter from you on the 7th of March, which I think is your well day, yet I have thought it right to reply to that short one which you despatched on the 5th, when the fit was going off. You say you are glad that I have staid; and tell me that you continue in your opinion. But in your former letters you seemed to me not to doubt but that I ought to go, provided Cnæus should embark with a respectable attendance, and the consuls should pass over. Have you then forgot this? or did I not rightly understand you? or have you changed your opinion? But either in the letter which I am expecting I shall see distinctly what you think, or I shall solicit another. Nothing has yet been heard from Brundisium. What a difficult and hopeless state! How in reasoning upon it you leave nothing unsaid! Yet in conclusion, how you explain nothing of your real sentiments! You are glad that I am not with Pompeius; and yet you state how disgraceful it would be for me to be present<sup>r</sup> while anything is said against him, and how impossible to approve it. I must certainly then oppose it. "God forbid," you say. What therefore is to be done, if in the one case there is guilt, in the other punishment? "Obtain," you say, "from Cæsar leave to absent yourself, and to remain quiet." Must I then descend to supplication? O sad! and what if it is denied me? And respecting my triumph, you say that I shall be at liberty to do as I please. But what if Cæsar should press it upon me? Should I accept it? What can be more disgraceful? Should I refuse? He will think that he is wholly spared; more so than in the affair of the twenty commissioners<sup>s</sup>: and he is accustomed, in exculpating himself, to throw upon me all the blame of these times; that I am so hostile to him, that I will not even receive honour at his hands. How much more unkindly will he bear this! just so much as the honour itself is greater, and he is more powerful. For as to what you say, that you doubt not but Pompeius is greatly offended with me at this time; I see no reason why he should be so at this time. Can he, who never acquainted me with his intention, till Corfinium had been lost; can he complain that I did not go to Brundisium, when Cæsar was between me and it? Besides, he knows that his complaining on that account is unjustifiable: he supposes me to have been better informed than himself about the weakness of the towns, about the levies, about peace, about the state of the city, about the treasury, about the occupation of Picenum. But if I would not go when it was in my power, then indeed he might be angry. Which I do not regard from fear of his doing me any harm; (for what can he do? "Who is a slave, that is not afraid to die?"<sup>t</sup>) but because I abhor the imputation of ingratitude. I trust therefore that my going to him, at whatever time it should be, would, as you say<sup>u</sup>, be acceptable. As to what you say, that if Cæsar acted with more moderation, you could give a more deliberate opinion; how is it possible that he should not act ruinously? His life, his manners, his former actions, the plan of his undertaking, his companions, the strength of the good, or even their firmness, demand it. I had scarcely read your letter, when Postumus Cæcilius came to me on his way to Cæsar, talking of nothing but fleets and armies: he was seizing Spain; occupying Asia, Sicilia, Africa, Sardinia, and presently pursuing Pompeius into Greece. I must go therefore, that I may be his companion, not so much in war as in flight; for I cannot bear the scoffs of those people, whoever they are. They assuredly are not, as they are called, good; yet I wish to know what it is they say; and I earnestly beg you to find out, and to inform me. Hitherto I am quite ignorant of what has been done at Brundisium. When I know, I shall take counsel from circumstances and opportunity, but shall be regulated by you.

LETTER III.

DOMITIUS's son passed through Formiæ on the 8th, hastening to his mother at Naples; and upon my servant Dionysius asking particularly about his father, he desired I might be told that he was in the city. But I had heard that he was gone either to Pompeius, or into Spain. I should be glad to know how this is; for it is of consequence to the subject of my present deliberation; that if he is certainly not gone anywhere, Cnæus may understand the difficulty of my leaving Italy, while it is all occupied by troops and garrisons, especially in winter. If it were a more favourable me of year, it would be possible to go by the northern sea: now nothing can pass but by the Adriatic, the road to which is intercepted. You will enquire therefore about Domitius, and about Lentulus. No report has yet arrived from Brundisium, and this is the 9th of March, on which day, or the day before, I imagine Cæsar would reach Brundisium; for on the first he stopped at Arpi. If you would hearken to Postumus, he will pursue Cnæus; or, by conjecture from state of the weather and number of days, he supposed him already to have passed over. For my own part, I do not think Cæsar will be able to get sailors; he is himself very confident, and the more so, because liberality of the man is known to the people earned in the boats. But it is impossible I can any longer remain in ignorance of this whole Brundisian business.

LETTER IV.

ALTHOUGH I feel some repose so long as I am writing to you, or reading your letters; yet I want still a subject to write about, and am persuaded you do so too. For that familiar communication, which passes between us, while our minds are at liberty, is excluded in these times; and what is appropriate to the times, is already exhausted. But, I may not resign myself wholly to sadness, I taken up certain subjects of a political nature, suited to the times; that I may both withdraw my mind from complaints, and may exercise myself in matters of present concern. Such are the following. If it be right to remain in one's country it is subjected to a tyrant. Being so subjected, every means should be employed to dissolve the tyranny, even at the risk of ruining the city. If must be taken, that the person who executes be not himself exalted. If it be right to leave one's country, under a tyrant, by opposition and reasoning, rather than by war. If, one's country is subjected to a tyrant, it be content with the duty of a good citizen to be and retire. If every danger ought to be endured for the sake of freedom. If war and might to be brought upon one's country when seduced by tyranny. If one, who does not attempt to put down a tyranny, may yet be reckoned among the number of good citizens. If we ought to support our benefactors and friends in political cases, even when we think them to have acted unwisely. If one who has rendered signal service to his country, and on that very account incurred troubles and envy, should voluntarily sacrifice himself for his country's sake. If it be incumbent on him to make provision for himself and family, and to leave state affairs to those in power.

Exercising myself in these questions, and on both sides in Greek and in Latin, I draw my attention a little from uneasiness, and devote something of real interest. But I may address you unseasonably; for if the person who brought your letter came straight to me, it will fall upon your sick day.

LETTER V.

I wrote to me on your birthday a letter full of wisdom, and at once expressive of the greatest knowledge and the greatest good sense. Philotimus delivered it to me the day after he had received it from you. The circumstances you mention are very difficult to arrange; the way to the Adriatic; the voyage by the Mediterranean; the departure to Arpinum, as if to avoid Cæsar; the remaining at Formiæ, as if on purpose to congratulate him. But nothing is more wretched than to see what presently, presently I say, must be seen. I have had Postumus with me: I told you how consequential he was. Q. Fusius likewise called upon me; with what an air! with what insolence! He was hastening to Brundisium; charging Pompeius with wickedness, the senate with fickleness and folly. Shall I, who cannot bear this in my villa, be able to bear Curtius in the senate? Or suppose me to bear it with ever so good a stomach; what must be the issue when I am called upon; "Speak, M. Tullius?" I say nothing of the republic, which I consider as lost both by the wounds it has received, and by the remedies which are prepared for it. But what shall I do about Pompeius? with whom (for why should I deny it?) I am quite angry. For the causes of events always affect us more than the events themselves. When I consider therefore these miseries (and what can be worse?) or rather when I reflect that they have been brought on by his means and his fault, I am more irritated against him than against Cæsar himself: in the same manner as our forefathers marked the day of the battle of the Allia*, as sadder than that of the taking the city; because the latter calamity was the consequence of the other: therefore the one is still held sacred, the other not even known to the common people. Thus am I angry while I recollect the errors of ten years past (among which was that year of affliction to me, when he, to say nothing worse, did not defend me), and perceive the rashness, the baseness, the negligence of the present time. But these things are now erased from my mind. I think of the benefits I have received from him, and think also of his own dignity. I understand, later indeed than I could wish, by reason of Balbus's letters and conversation; but I see plainly that nothing else is aimed at, nothing else has been aimed at from the beginning, but his death. Shall I then, (if Achilles, according to Homer, when his mother goddess told him that his fate would presently follow that of Hector, replied, "Would that I might die immediately, since I could not prevent the death of my friend;" what if not only a friend, but also a benefactor; such a man too, and engaged in such a cause? And shall I then) think these duties to be trafficked away for the sake of life? I place no reliance on your principal people, and now no more defer to them. I see how they give themselves, and will give themselves, to this man. Do you think those decrees of the towns for Pompeius's health bear any comparison with these congratulations of victory? "They are afraid," you will say. "Themselves say they were afraid before. But let us see what has been done at Brundisium. From that perhaps will arise my determination, and another letter.

* Postumus Curtius. See letter 2 of this book.

† The Gauls defeated the Romans at the river Allia, previous to their taking the city.

‡ The context appears to me to require an interrogation in this place.

LETTER VI.

I HAVE yet heard nothing from Brundisium, Balbus has written from Rome, saying that he supposes the consul Lentulus to have crossed the sea, without being met by the younger Balbus; who had already heard this at Canusium, from whence he wrote to his uncle. And he added that the six cohorts, which had been at Alba, had gone over to Curius by the Minucian road; that Cæsar had written to inform him of it, and would shortly be at Rome. I shall follow your advice, and shall not hide myself at Arpinum at this time; though I wished to invest my son with the toga of manhood at Arpinum<sup>a</sup>, and had intended to leave this as my excuse to Cæsar. But he might perhaps be offended at that very circumstance, that I should not rather do it at Rome. If, however, it is right to meet him, it is best here. We will then consider the rest; whether I should go, and by what road, and when. Domitius, as I hear, is in the neighbourhood of Cosa<sup>b</sup>; and, as they say, is prepared to sail. If to Spain, I do not approve it; if to Cnæus, I commend him: but anywhere rather than to see Curtius<sup>c</sup>, whom even I, that have been his patron, cannot bear to look at. What then? Must I bear others<sup>d</sup>? But I must be quiet, that I may not aggravate my own fault: for through my affection to the city, that is, to my country, and hoping that affairs might be compromised, I have managed so as to be completely intercepted and taken. Since writing the above I have received a letter from Capua to this effect: Pompeius has crossed the sea with all the troops that he had with him, amounting to 30,000 men, besides the two consuls, and those tribunes of the people and senators, who were with him, all with their wives and children. He is said to have embarked the 4th of March, from which day the winds have been northerly. They say that he either cut in two, or burned, all the vessels which he did not use. The letter containing this account was brought to L. Metellus, the tribune of the people, at Capua, from his mother-in-law, Clodia, who herself passed over. I was before solicitous and anxious, as indeed the circumstances required, while I could bring my mind to no conclusion: but now, since Pompeius and the consuls have left Italy, I am no longer anxious, but burn with grief; and, as Homer says, "Neither is my mind sound, but I am distracted." Believe me, I am not master of myself, so great is the disgrace I seem to have incurred. In the first place, by not having been with Pompeius, whatever plan he adopted; then, in not having been with the good, however ill their cause was conducted. Especially when the very persons for whose sake I was more timid in exposing myself to the risks of fortune, my wife, my daughter, the young Ciceros, wished me to follow that course; and considered this to be base and unworthy of me. My brother Quintus, indeed, said he should be satisfied with whatever I chose; and he followed it with perfect complacency. I now read over your letters from the beginning; and they afford me some comfort. The first misse and beg me not to throw myself away; the next show that you are glad I have remained. When I read these, I think myself less blameable; but it is only while I am reading them: afterwards my regret again bursts forth, and, as it is said, "I am haunted with shame." I beseech you, therefore, my Titus, pluck out from me this trouble, or at least diminish it either by consolation, or advice, or any way you can. But what can you do? or what can any man? Hardly any god. I am considering (as you advise, and hope may be effected) how I can get Cæsar's permission to absent myself when anything is agitated in the senate against Cnæus: but I fear I may not obtain it. Furnius has arrived from him; and, that you may know whose example I follow, he brings word that Q. Titinius' son is with Cæsar. He sends me greater thanks than I could wish. What he asks of me, in few words indeed, but energetically, you shall see by his own letter. How unfortunate that you should have been unwell! Had we been together, there surely would have been no want of counsel—"And going two in company," &c. But, let us not act over the past; let us provide for what remains. These two things have hitherto deceived me; at first, the hope of accommodation; upon which taking place I had wished to pass my old age free from anxiety and popular strife; afterwards, the understanding that Pompeius had actually engaged in a cruel and deadly warfare. Is truth I thought it argued a better citizen, and a better man, rather to undergo any punishment, than not only to take the lead, but to take my part in such cruelty. It appears preferable even to die than to be leagued with such men. Think of these matters, my Atticus, or rather resolve. I can bear any event better than my present anguish.

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

HAVING but just seen our friend Furnius, without being able conveniently either to speak to him or hear him, being in a hurry, and actually on my road, with my troops already sent on before; I could not, however, let pass the opportunity of writing to you, and sending him to thank you. If I have frequently done this, yet I am likely to do it still more frequently; so greatly am I obliged to you. Especially I have to beg of you, as I trust I shall soon arrive in Rome, to let me see you there, that I may be able to avail myself of your advice, influence, dignity, and assistance in everything. I must end as I began, and request you to excuse my haste, and the shortness of my letter. You will hear the rest from Furnius.

LETTER VII.

I HAD written a letter to you, which should have been sent the 12th of March; but the person whom I meant to entrust it did not go that day. At the very same day, came that swift-foot, as I have called him, and brought me your very satisfactory letter, which again instilled into me some life. Restored I cannot call myself: but what next to this you have done. Trust me, I now longer think of a prosperous termination: for I that as long as these two, or this one, is living, shall never have a republic. Therefore I now aside all hope of retirement, and am prepared every severity. My only fear was that of doing, I may say, of having done anything discreditable. Let me assure you then that your letter is valuable to me; and not only that longer one, in which nothing can be more explicit, nothing more complete; but also the shorter one, in which as particularly agreeable to me to understand my sentiments and conduct were approved by you. You have done me a great kindness; for now that he loves me, and that he understands it is right. Your longer letter has relieved not only, but all my family, from anxiety. I shall readily adopt your advice, and stay in Formina; least either my going to meet him in Rome create observation; or if I neither see him nor there, he may think that I try to avoid

As to what you advise, that I should ask to let me pay the same regard to Pompeius which I pay to him, you will see by the letter of us and Oppius, of which I send you a copy, I have already done so. I send also Cæsar's letter to them, written with great temper, for such tempered state. If Cæsar does not grant me I perceive that you approve of my undergoing a negotiation for peace; in which I do not dread the hazard that attends it. For when so dangers threaten us, why should I not commend for the most honourable? But I apprehend

I shall bring some embarrassment upon Pompeius, and that he will be inclined to turn me "the appalling horror of the Gorgon's head." For our friend Cæsar has been strangely jealous of a sovereignty like that of Sulla. I write with confidence. He never was less secret. Would you then," you say, "join such a party?" I follow him, believe me, from a sense of the benefits I have received, not from a love of cause, as in the case of Milo; as in—but not of this. "Is not then his cause a good one?" Yes, the very best: but it will be considered, mind you, most foully. The first object starve the city and all Italy by famine; then waste and burn the country, and not to spare property of the opulent. But, as I apprehend the same calamities from this party; if there be not on the other side a sense of benefits conferred, I should think it more proper to bear at whatever might happen. But I consider

The original is a verse of Homer. The meaning here is he might have to encounter the frown of Pompeius, as averse from any compromise. It is possible that everyity of countenance spoken of by Plutarch, as αὐχρὴν καὶ τὸ βασίλειον, may have given occasion to application of this line to him.

was formerly spoken of as wanting openness. See letters 9 and 15.

myself under such obligations to him, that I dare not expose myself to the charge of ingratitude, however just an excuse for it you point out. About my triumph I agree with you, and easily and willingly give up all thoughts of it. I am uncommonly pleased with the hope that in the midst of our arrangements the season for sailing may creep on unobserved. "If only," as you say, "Pompeius is strong enough." He is stronger even than I thought. But whatever hope you may entertain of him, I engage that, if he prevails, he will leave no tile in Italy unbroken. "And will you then be his associate?" Against indeed my own judgment: and against the authority of all antiquity. I wish to get away, not so much to promote what is done there, as that I may not witness what is done here. For do not suppose that the madness of these people can be supportable, or confined to one kind: though nothing of this has escaped your penetration. When the laws, the judicial proceedings, and the senate, are taken away; neither private property nor the republic will be able to support the licentiousness, the boldness, the extravagance, the needs of so many needy men. Let us away then by any passage, though I submit this to your judgment; but by all means let us away. We shall soon know that which you wait for; what has been done at Brundisium. It gives me great pleasure, if indeed there is now any room for pleasure, that you say my conduct hitherto is approved by the good, at the same time that they know I have not left the country. I will endeavour to find out more particularly about Lentulus: I have entrusted this to Philotimus, a bold man, and more than enough attached to the senatorian party. In conclusion, you may perhaps be at a loss for a subject to write upon; for it is impossible at this time to write about anything else; and about this what more can now be said? But as both your wit supplies you (I speak forsooth as I think), and your affection, by which my wit likewise is sharpened; continue as you do, and write as much as you can. I am half angry that you do not invite me to Epirus, where I should not be a troublesome companion. But farewell. For as you must exercise and anoint yourself, so I must sleep; which your letter enables me to do.

Balbus and Oppius to M. Cicero.

THE counsels, not only of inconsiderable people, as we are, but even of the greatest men, are apt to be interpreted by the event, not by the intention. Yet relying on your goodness, we give you the best opinion we can upon the subject about which you wrote to us. And if it be not wise, at least it proceeds from honest minds, and the kindest regards. Unless we were assured from himself that Cæsar would do what in our judgment he ought to do; that as soon as he comes to Rome he will enter upon measures of reconciliation with Pompeius; we should cease to exhort you to take a part in this affair, in order that the whole may be effected

more easily, and with more dignity, through you, who are connected with both parties. On the other hand, if we thought that Cæsar would not do so, but was desirous of engaging in war with Pompeius; we never would persuade you to bear arms against one who has shown you the greatest kindness; as we have always entreated you not to fight against Cæsar. But still, since we are rather able to guess than to know what Cæsar will do, we can only say, that it does not appear suitable to your dignity and known probity, being so attached to both, to bear arms against either; and we have no doubt but Cæsar will highly approve this, agreeably to his accustomed humanity. But, if you wish it, we will write to Cæsar, in order to ascertain more certainly what he will do in this affair<sup>j</sup>: from whom if we receive an answer, we will immediately let you know our opinion; and promise you, that we will advise what seems to us most becoming your dignity, not what may be most beneficial to Cæsar's cause: and this, we believe, Cæsar will approve, according to his indulgence towards his friends.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

I HOPE you are well. After I had despatched to you the joint letter with Oppius, I received one from Cæsar, of which I inclose a copy. From thence you may perceive how desirous he is of peace and of reconciliation with Pompeius; and how far he is from all cruelty; and I sincerely rejoice, as I ought, that he entertains such sentiments. With respect to yourself, and your integrity, and duty, I think, my Cicero, as you do, that it is impossible your reputation and attachment can permit you to bear arms against one from whom you profess to have received such kindness. That Cæsar will approve this I am confident, from his distinguished humanity; and I know for certain that he will be abundantly satisfied with you, provided you take no part in the war against him, and do not join his adversaries. And he will not only deem this sufficient in one of your high character; but, of his own accord, he has given me leave to absent myself from the army, that might have to act against Lentulus or Pompeius, to whom I am under great obligations: and he said, that he should be satisfied if, when I was called upon, I would undertake for him the business relating to the city; and that I was at liberty to do the same for them<sup>k</sup>. Accordingly I am at this time conducting and supporting Lentulus's affairs at Rome; and I maintain towards them my duty, fidelity and gratitude. But, in truth, I consider the hope of agreement to be now again cast off, not entirely desperate; since Cæsar's disposition is such as we ought to desire. In this case I think, if it meets with your approbation, that you should write to him, and request from him a guard; as you did from Pompeius, with my approbation, at the time of Milo's trial. I will engage, if I know anything of Cæsar, that he will sooner consider your dignity than his own advantage. How prudently I may advise you I know not; but this I know, that whatever I write to you, I write from the purest affection and regard: for, so may I die without prejudice to Cæsar<sup>l</sup>, as I esteem few equally dear to me as yourself. When you have come to any determination about this business<sup>m</sup>, I wish you would write to me: for I am not a little earnest that you should be able, as you desire, to show your kindness towards both<sup>n</sup>. And this I trust you will do. Farewell.

I AM very glad that you express in your letter how much you approve of what has been done at Corfinium. I shall willingly adopt your advice; and the more so, because of my own accord I had resolved to show every lenity, and to use my endeavours to conciliate Pompeius. Let us try by these means if we can regain the affections of all people, and render our victory lasting. Others, from their cruelty, have not been able to avoid the hatred of mankind, nor long to retain their victory; except L. Sulla alone, whom I do not mean to imitate. Let this be a new method of conquering, to fortify ourselves with kindness and liberality. How this may be done, some things occur to my own mind, and many others may be found. To this subject I request your attention. I have taken Cn. Magius, Pompeius's præfect. I accordingly put in practice my own principle, and immediately released him. Already two of Pompeius's præfects of engineers have fallen into my power, and have been released. If they are disposed to be grateful, they should exhort Pompeius to prefer my friendship to that of these people, who have always been the worst enemies to him and to me; by whose artifices it has happened that the republic has come into this condition.

LETTER VIII.

WHILE I was at dinner on the 14th, and it was late, Statius brought me a short letter from you. Respecting the inquiry you make about L. Torquatus, not only Lucius, but Aulus also, is gone<sup>p</sup>, the former several days ago. I am concerned for what you mention about the assemblies of the Reatini, that there should be any seeds of proscription in the Sabine country. I had heard likewise<sup>q</sup> that many senators were at Rome. Can you tell why they ever left it<sup>r</sup>? It is the general opinion in these parts, rather from conjecture than from any message, or letter, that Cæsar will be at Formiæ the 22d of March. Here now should I like to have that Minerva of Homer, who took the form of Mentor, to whom I might say, "Mentor, how shall I go; or how shall I accost him?" Nothing more difficult ever occurred to me. I think of it, however; and at least shall not, as sometimes happens, be taken by surprise. But take care of your health,—for I think yesterday was your bad day.

LETTER IX.

I RECEIVED three letters from you on the 16th. They were dated the 12th, 13th, and 14th. I will, therefore, reply to them in their order. I agree with you, that it is best to remain in Formidone; also about the passage by the Adriatic sea; and, as I mentioned to you before, I will try if I can get his consent to my taking no part in public affairs. What you approve, that I told you I follow; the precious conduct and errors of our friends, as even so. Nay, I remember not those very circumstances which you mention of his misconduct towards me. So much do I desire that my attitude for his kindness may overpower all sense of ill-treatment. Let us do then as you advise, and recollect ourselves. For I philosophise as I go into the country; and in my walks I do cease to meditate upon the subjects I mentioned to you. But some of them are very difficult to examine. Respecting the principal citizens, be as you please; but you know that saying, "Dionysius in Corinth." Titinius' son is with me. But what you seem to fear, that your address may displease me; this is so far from being the case, that your opinion and your letters are the thing that give me pleasure. Therefore continue, as you profess, to write to me whatever comes into your mind. Nothing can be more profitable to me. I come now to the next letter. You are not rightly informed about the number of Pompeius' soldiers. Clodia mentioned more by half. The story too about the ships that were voyaged, is not true. When you commend the consuls, I also commend their intentions, though I disapprove their conduct: for owing to their dissension, negotiation for peace is prevented, which I was waiting. Accordingly, I have sent back to you hitherto the treatise of Demetrius upon Consuls. I cannot doubt but a most destructive war is over us, the first operation of which will elate in the want of provisions. Yet I am glad that I have no part in this war, notwithstanding such a load of wickedness will do it; for, whereas the not supporting it is criminal: our chief's design to destroy most venerable and sacred parents, their country, famine. And this I fear, not from conjecture but from the conversations at which I have present. All this fleet from Alexandria, Cilicia, Tyre, Sidon, Aradus, Cyprus, Paphlagonia, Rhodes, Chios, Byzantium, Lesbos, and Ionia, and Coa, is collected for the purpose of starving the supplies of Italy, and of occupying the coasts from whence they are drawn. Then it is not without reason that I should be angry, and that I should think it better to perish within my country, than in leaving my country to ruin, and setting the northern parts on fire. I think with you: the 4th letter of this book.

Everyday, from being an absolute monarch, he became a schoolmaster at Carthage. Hence the common saying to men, that those who were once great are to be strangely humbled.

the northern parts of Greece were here to be in and fear that Epirus may suffer. But what place in Greece do you suppose will escape being plundered? For he professes openly, and holds out to his soldiers, that even in his bounties he will show himself the superior. You very justly advise me, when I see Caesar, not to address him with over civility, but rather to maintain my dignity. And so I shall certainly do. After our meeting, I think of going to Arpinum; for I would not be absent when he comes; nor should I like to be running backwards and forwards on so wretched a road. I hear, as you mention, that Bibulus arrived, and returned again the 14th. In the third letter you say that you were expecting Philotimus. He left me on the 15th. This was the reason that the answer, which I wrote immediately upon the receipt of your letter, was later in reaching you. Respecting Domitius, I imagine, as you say, that he is in Cosa, and that his intention is not known. That base and sordid man, who says that the consular comitia may be held by the pretor, is the same that he always was in the republic. This is the real meaning of what Caesar writes in the letter of which I sent you a copy, that he wishes to avail himself of my advice; well, suppose this to be a general expression, my influence,—this is absurd; but I imagine he pretends this with regard to some opinions of the senators: my dignity, meaning perhaps the opinion of one of consular rank: at last comes my assistance in everything. I begin to suspect from your letter, that his intention was what I have hinted, or not very different. For it is of great consequence to him that the business should not come to an interregnum. If the consuls are created by the pretor, he gains his point. But in our augural books we read not only that the consuls, but even the pretors, cannot lawfully be created by a pretor, and that it never has been done. In the case of consuls it is not allowed, because a higher command cannot be instituted by an inferior one: and in the case of pretors, because they are created as assistants to the consuls, who are of superior authority. He will be very likely to refer this to me, and not to rest satisfied with the opinion of Cato, Scipio, Cato, Antonius. "Then may the wide earth gape to receive me!" You see what a storm brings over me. I will send you the names of the senators who have passed over, when I have ascertained them. You are quite right about the supplies of corn, which cannot properly be managed without subsidies: but it is strange reason, that you fear those who are about to be full of ornaments: and second among which was accused Atticus: property in Epirus.

* It is not known who is here meant. Some suppose it is the legatus who was at that time present. The whole of this letter being in reply to those that were sent from Atticus, may naturally be supposed to be written by alluding to persons and to facts that were then known.

* Interpreted of the person of the legatus.

* In the absence of the consuls an interregnum must be created to hold the consular. In this case Caesar would not be master of the interregnum, which he would be if created.

* It is to be supposed that these were senators who, as Cicero said in de Legibus, de Provinciis, &c. were the highest in government at that time.

* Taken from de Legibus.

* It is not to be supposed by Cicero that the interregnum was to be created by the legatus and the legatus was to be created by the legatus.

dread an iniquitous war. I should be glad to see our friend Trebatius, though, as you say, he has no hope of anything good. Press him to make haste: for it will be convenient that he should come before Cæsar's arrival. Respecting Lanuinum, as soon as I heard that Phameas was dead, I wished, if there should ever be a republic, that one of my friends might buy it. But of you, who are most especially mine, I never thought. For I knew that you used to inquire at how many years' purchase, and what is the productiveness of the soil; and had seen your book of accounts<sup>d</sup> not only at Rome, but at Delos. However, though it is very pretty, yet I should value it lower than it was valued in the consularship of Marcellinus, when I thought, on account of the house which I then had at Antium, that those gardens would be pleasanter to me, and less expensive, than the refitting my villa at Tusculum. I offered 500 sestertia (4000*l.*), through a surety to whom he might surrender it, when it was to be sold at Antium: but he would not accept it. Now however I imagine everything of that kind is lowered on account of the scarcity of money. It will be most convenient for me, or rather for us, if you purchase it. Take care not to undervalue his absurdities<sup>e</sup>. The place is exceedingly beautiful: though I look upon all these things as already devoted to destruction. I have answered your three letters; but am expecting others. For hitherto it is your letters that have supported me. Dated on the Liberalia<sup>f</sup>.

LETTER X.

I HAVE nothing to tell you; for I have heard no news, and I answered all your letters yesterday. But while my anxiety not only deprives me of sleep, but does not even suffer me to be awake without great uneasiness, I have determined to write I know not what, upon no particular subject, that I may, as it were, converse with you; in which alone I find consolation. I seem to have lost my reason from the beginning; and this one consideration vexes me, that while Pompeius was sinking, or rather rushing to destruction, I should not in all events have accompanied him, like one of his troop. I saw him on the 19th of January full of alarm; and from that day I perceived what course he would take. He has never pleased me since, nor has he ever ceased to commit one error after another. In the mean time he has never written to me; and has thought of nothing but flight. In short, as in affairs of love we are disgusted by a want of cleanliness, of sense, or of delicacy; so the baseness of his flight, and his neglect, turned away my affection: for his conduct has been void of all merit, that should induce me to join him. But now my affection again rises up; now I cannot bear to be without him; now neither books, nor study, nor philosophy, afford me any relief; so that, like Plato's bird<sup>g</sup>, I look upon the sea day and night, and long

to take my flight. I pay, I pay the penalty of my folly: yet what folly have I committed? What have I not done with due deliberation? For, had I no object besides flight, I might have fled with all readiness; but I shuddered at the idea of a cruel and extensive war, of which people do not yet see the wretchedness. What threats are held out to the towns! and to good men by name! and in short to all who stay behind! How often does he repeat, "Sulla was able, shall not I be able?" Besides, this stuck with me: Tarquinius acted ill, who excited Porsena and Octavius Mamilius against his country: Coriolanus most undutifully, who solicited succour from the Volsci: Themistocles nobly, who chose rather to die: and Hippas, the son of Pisistratus, was branded with infamy, who fell in the battle of Marathon bearing arms against his country. But Sulla, but Marius, but Cinna, did well, perhaps even rightly; yet what could be more cruel, more destructive, than their victory? A war of this kind I wished to avoid; and the more so, because I saw that still greater cruelties were devised and prepared. Should I, whom some have called the preserver, the father of that city, bring against it the forces of the Getæ, and Armenians, and Colchians? Should I bring famine upon my fellow-citizens, ruin upon Italy? I considered that this<sup>h</sup> man in the first place was mortal; then, that he might be destroyed in many ways: but I thought the city, and people, ought, as far as in us lies, to be preserved to immortality. At the same time a certain hope presented itself to me, that something might be agreed upon, rather than that either the one should admit such a degree of wickedness, or the other such a degree of profligacy. Now the general concern is altered, and my particular concern is altered with it. To me, as it is expressed in one of your letters, it seems as if the sun had fallen out of the world. As they say of the sick, that while there is life, there is hope; so I, as long as Pompeius was in Italy, did not cease to hope. This, this it was that deceived me; and, to speak the truth, my age already declining from continual labours towards a state of repose, soothed me with the charm of domestic life. Now, though the attempt be attended with danger, I certainly will attempt to fly away from hence. I ought perhaps to have done it sooner; but the circumstances I have mentioned delayed me, and above all your authority. For when I got to this place I opened the bundle of your letters, which I have under my seal, and keep with the greatest care. In one, that was dated January 23, I find it thus: "But let us see what Cnæus does, and in what direction his designs flow. If he should leave Italy, he will act altogether wrong, and in my judgment inadvisedly; and in of Syracuse, compared himself to a bird longing to make its escape.

<sup>h</sup> This is generally understood of Cæsar; I rather understand it of Pompeius: the sense being, that Cicero was not so to support Pompeius, who might die at any time, as to ruin his country, which ought to be preserved for ever. And this he gives as a reason for not immediately joining Pompeius. He besides still cherished hopes of peace; and that neither Pompeius would be so wicked as to destroy his country, nor Cæsar so profligate as to enslave it. But now that they had thrown off the mask, and shown their real intentions, and extinguished all ideas of accommodation, the whole state of affairs was changed, and Cicero's duty changed likewise.

at case our plans must be changed." This you write four days after I left the city. Again, on the 14th of January: "Provided our Cnæus does not relinquish Italy as inadvisably as he has relinquished the city." The same day you send a second letter, in which you distinctly reply to my questions. It is thus: "I come now to your resolution. If Cnæus leaves Italy, I think you would return to the city: for what end is there of telling about?" This struck me forcibly,—and now see it to be even so, that a boundless war is ended with a wretched flight; which you represent as travelling. There follows an oracular opinion on the 27th of January: "If Pompeius remains Italy, and no agreement is made, I think there will be a protracted war; but if he leaves Italy, I think that a war is prepared, which will hereafter be interminable." In this war I am obliged to be a partaker, a companion, and an assistant; or interminable, and with fellow-citizens! Then on the 7th of February, when you began already to more of Pompeius's design, you conclude one of your letters in this manner: "I do not indeed advise if Pompeius leaves Italy, that you should also go away; for you will do it with great risk, and not benefit the republic; which you may benefit hereafter, if you remain." Who that had any love for his country, or any public spirit, would be moved by such advice, upon the authority of a prudent man and a friend? Further, on the 14th of February, you again reply to my inquiries: "What you ask me, whether I think preferable, a flight in which I preserve my fidelity, or stay which must be relinquished? I certainly think at present that a sudden departure and pre-arranged journey would be useless to Cnæus himself, hazardous to you; and I think it better that your party should be dispersed, and in places of observation: and in truth I think it disgraceful for us to aim at any design of flight." This disgraceful conduct of our friend Cnæus meditated two years ago; he has his mind dwelt upon Sulla, and upon his options. Afterwards when, as I imagine, I had written to me something in a more general strain, and I had supposed some expressions in that I should quit Italy<sup>1</sup>, you distinctly state this on the 14th of February: "I assure you I never meant in any letter to express that Cnæus went out of Italy, you should go with him; or if I expressed it, I must have been, I do think, an inconsistent man, but a mad man." In the next part of the same letter: "Nothing is left me but flight; but I by no means think, or ever thought, that it was your duty to accompany him." But this whole consideration you undertake particularly in a letter dated the 12th of March: "If M. Lepidus and L. Volcatius think you ought to remain; yet so, that Cnæus is in safety and makes a stand anywhere, you may leave this ghastly troop<sup>2</sup>, and offer yourself to be defeated in battle with them, than reign with Cæsar among that rabble, which it is evident they will be reduced." I use many arguments in support of this; and in conclusion you say, "What if Cnæus and Volcatius go away? I am completely at their disposal: and whatever happens therefore, and what you do, I shall think that we ought to be satisfied with it." If you then doubted, now at least you do not doubt, as they remain. Then, at the very time of his flight, February 25: "In the mean time I do not doubt but you will remain in Formianum; for you can there with most convenience wait for what may happen." On the 1st of March, when he had already been four days at Brundisium: "We shall then be able to deliberate, while the cause is not indeed whole and entire, but certainly less infringed, than if you threw yourself away with him." Again, March 4, when your answer was coming on, in consequence of which you wrote very briefly, you add however: "To-morrow I will write more, and reply to all your observations: so much however I will say, that I do not repent of the advice I gave about your stay; and, though it must be attended with great anxiety, yet as I think it less objectionable than your going, I continue in the same opinion, and am glad that you have remained." But when I was uneasy, and afraid lest I might have acted unbecomingly; on the 3d of March you say, "Nevertheless, I am not sorry that you are not with Pompeius. Hereafter, if there is occasion, it will not be difficult; and whenever it is done, it will be very gratifying to him. But I must add, that if Cæsar goes on to act, as he has begun, with candour, moderation, and prudence, I shall think again, and consider more deliberately what is best to be done." On the 9th of March you write also that our friend Peduceus approves of my remaining quiet; and his opinion has great weight with me. With these letters of yours I comfort myself by thinking that hitherto I have not done wrong. Do you only defend your own opinion. With regard to myself it is unnecessary; but I want to have others know it. If only I have not erred, I will take care of the rest. Let me have your encouragement, and assist me altogether with your judgment. Here nothing is yet heard about Cæsar's return. So much at least I have gained by this letter, that I have read over all yours, and in so doing have found consolation.

LETTER XI.

You know our friend Lentulus is at Puteoli. Upon hearing this from a passenger, who said that he recognised him on the Appian road, where he was travelling in a litter partly opened; however improbable it might be, yet I sent a servant to Puteoli to ascertain the fact, and sent a letter to him. He found him just secluding himself in his villa, from whence he wrote back to me full of gratitude to Cæsar, and saying that he had delivered to C. Cæcilius instructions for me about his future plans: him I expect to-day, that is, the 20th of March. Matius also came to me the 19th,—a man, as he has appeared to me, temperate and prudent; and has always been supposed to be in favour of peace. How much he seemed to disapprove these proceedings! How much to dread that ghastly troop, as you call them! In a long conversation which I had with him, I showed him Cæsar's letter to me, of which I before sent you a copy, and asked him to explain to me what it was he meant by saying that he wished to avail himself of my advice, my influence, my dignity, my assistance in everything<sup>3</sup>.

He replied, that he had no doubt he wanted my assistance and influence to promote an accommodation. Would that it were possible for me to effect, or help forward, any measure of public utility in this wretched state of the country! M. Matius likewise was persuaded that he was so disposed, and promised that he would himself advise it. Yesterday Crassipes was with me, who said that he had come from Brundisium the 6th of March, and had left Pompeius there; which was the report also of those who had come from thence on the 8th. And all agreed (amongst whom was Crassipes also, who would listen with more prudence<sup>1</sup>) that they used threatening language, unfriendly towards the principal citizens, hostile to the towns, more proscriptions, more Sullas<sup>2</sup>: that Luccius, that all Greece, that Theophanes also, talked in this manner. Yet in these people is all our hope of safety; and I watch in my mind, and take no rest, and in order to avoid the calamities at home, am wishing to be with persons most unlike myself. For what excess do you suppose Scipio, and Faustus, and Libo<sup>3</sup>, will not commit; whose creditors are said to be meeting<sup>4</sup>? And, if they are successful, how will they harass the citizens! But what distant views do they relate of our Cneus! that he thinks of going to Egypt, and Arabia, and Mesopotamia, and has laid aside all idea of Spain. Such stories are monstrous; but perhaps they are not true. Assuredly things are both ruinous here, and there by no means well disposed. I am already wishing to hear from you. Since my retreat from the city, there has never been on my part any interruption of our correspondence. I send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar, by which I hope to produce some effect.

Cicero, Imperator, to Cæsar, Imperator.

UPON reading your letter<sup>5</sup>, which I received by my friend Furnius, relative to my being in the city, I was not so much surprised at your wishing to avail yourself of my advice, and dignity; but I asked myself what you meant by my influence and assistance. And I was led by my hopes to this conclusion; that agreeably to your admirable and singular prudence, I supposed you might wish some steps to be taken for the tranquillity, the peace, the union of the citizens: and for that purpose I thought my character and person sufficiently suited. Which if it be so, and if you are touched with any regard for protecting my friend Pompeius, and reconciling him with yourself and the republic, you will indeed find nobody more ready than I am in such a cause; having always been to him, and to the senate, as soon as I could, the counsellor of peace. Nor have I by taking up arms had any part in the war; but have thought that you were injured in it, and that unfriendly and envious persons were resisting the honour<sup>6</sup> which had been granted you by the favour of the Roman people. But as at that time I not only supported your dignity, but also got others to assist you; so now am I greatly interested for the dignity of Pompeius. It is now some years since I selected you two, whom I might particularly cultivate, and with whom I might be, as I am, in the strictest friendship. I therefore request of you, or rather I beg and entreat you with all earnestness, that among your great cares you would allot some time also to this consideration, that by your favour I may be enabled to sustain the part of a good man, grateful and dutiful in the remembrance of the greatest benefits<sup>7</sup>. If this concerned myself only, I should nevertheless hope to obtain it from you; but, as I conceive, it concerns both your own plighted faith, and the republic, that out of a few I should be reserved by your means, as one particularly suited to renew the harmony of you two, and of the citizens. Though I have before thanked you on account of Lentulus, whom you have saved, as he did me; yet upon reading the letter, which he wrote to me full of gratitude for your liberality and kindness<sup>8</sup>, I considered myself to have received from you the same benefit you have conferred upon him. If then you perceive that I am grateful towards him, give me the power of being so likewise towards Pompeius<sup>9</sup>.

LETTER XI<sup>10</sup>.

I AM not sorry that you say about my letter<sup>11</sup> being made public; and have even myself allowed several people to take copies of it. For after what has happened, and still threatens us, I should be well pleased to have my sentiments recorded concerning a peace. But in recommending this, especially to such a man, I thought there was no readier means of moving him, than by affirming that the measure, to which I exhorted him, was worthy of his prudence. And if I have spoken of his prudence in terms of admiration while I was calling upon him to save his country, I am not afraid of appearing to flatter a man, at whose feet I would willingly have thrown myself in such a cause. But where it is said, that you would allot some time; this is not that he should consider about peace; but about me, and my duty<sup>12</sup>. For when I affirm that I have not engaged in the war, although it is evident from the fact, yet I added it for the purpose of giving weight to my persuasion. And it is with the same view that I approve his cause. But why is this brought forward now? Would that any good had followed! Nay, I should be glad to have my letter read in the public assembly; since Pompeius himself made public his own letter to him, in which he says, for your most distinguished conduct<sup>13</sup>. More distin-ished than his own? than that of Africanus? which was the current of the times. Even you two, respected, go to meet him at the fifth mile-stone. What? to meet him on his return from whence? for what? or purposing to do what? With what additional spirit will he trust in his cause, when he sees you, and others like you, greeting him not only with their numbers, but with cheerful looks? Is it we then to blame? I do not mean at all to accuse you: but the marks which should disfigure real good-will from mere pretence are ungently confounded. But what decrees of the senate do I foresee? I am speaking however more fully than I had intended. I mean to be at Arpinum the last day of the month, and thence to visit several villas, which I despair of seeing afterwards.

LETTER XII.

WHILE I was reading your letter on the 20th of March, I received one from Lepta, informing me that Pompeius was surrounded, and that even the age out of the harbour was occupied with rafts, and not bear to think or write the rest for weeping.

I send you a copy of it. Wretched as we are, why did we not all follow his destiny? The intelligence is brought from Matus and Trebia, who met with Caesar's messengers at Minerva. I am distracted with grief, and already the fate of Mucius*. But how honourable, clear are your counsels! how well considered, directing my journey by land, my passage by sea, meeting and conversation with Caesar! All is honourable and cautious. And how kind, generous, how brotherly, is your invitation to us! I am surprised about Dionysius, who treated by me with more honour than Panætius by Scipio, and yet has most foully insulted the present state of my fortune. I hate the man, will hate him, and wish I could punish him; is own humour will punish him sufficiently. especially I beg you to consider what I ought

An army of the Roman people invests Cn. Cneius! keeps him inclosed with a trench and prevents his escape! Do I live? And city standing? Do the prætors continue to give judgment? Do the ædiles prepare the games? Do substantial men continue to serve their interest? And do I myself sit idle? I madly endeavour to go thither, to implore the aid of the towns? The honest will not follow; the inconsiderate will laugh at me; and who are eager for a change, especially being and victorious, will use violence, and lay upon me. What think you then? Have any counsel for the remains of this wretched I am grieved, and vexed; while some think I am, or fortunate, in not having gone with But I think otherwise. For though I never wished to be his companion in victory, I should desire to be so in adversity. Why should I now request your letters, your prudence, or kindness! The thing is over. Nothing can now help me, who have not even anything left to wish for, but that he may be delivered by some compassion of the enemy*. I suspect that the account of the rafts is not true. Else what is it that Dolabella means in this letter, which he sent from Brundisium the 13th of March, calling it the good fortune of Caesar, that Pompeius should be on his flight; and that he would sail with the first wind? which is very different from those letters, of which I before sent you copies. Here they talk of mere cruelties. But there is no later or better authority than that of Dolabella.

It appears to be asked as by Atticus and Peducaeus. Lucius Scaevola was killed in a former civil war by Marius. This is before alluded to. See book viii.

LETTER XIII.

I RECEIVED your letter on the 22d, in which you defer all counsel to that time when we shall have learned what has been done. In truth so it must be; nor in the interval can anything be determined, or even planned; although the recent letter of Dolabella encourages me to resume my former considerations: for, on the 18th there was a favourable wind, of which I suppose he would take advantage. The collection of your opinions was not brought together for the sake of lamentation, but rather for my consolation. For I was not so much distressed with these calamities, as with the suspicion of my own fault, or folly: these thoughts I now dismiss, since my conduct and counsels have the sanction of your judgment. When you say that my being under such great obligations to him, is more a matter of acknowledgement on my part than of desert on his; it is so. I have always extolled to the utmost what he did; and the more, that he might not suppose I harboured the remembrance of what had passed before*. Which however well I may remember, yet now it becomes me to follow the pattern of his conduct at that time. He gave me no assistance when it was in his power; and afterward he became friendly, indeed extremely so, from what reason I know not. I will therefore do the same to him. Moreover, this is alike in both of us, that we have been led into error by the very same people*. I only wish I were able to assist him as much as he was able to assist me. What he did however is most grateful to me. But I neither know in what manner I can now help him; nor, if I could, should I think it right to do so while he is preparing such a deadly war. I would only avoid giving him offence by staying here. I can neither bear to see what you may already anticipate in your mind, nor to * Cicero probably received Dolabella's letter subsequently to his writing the above. This may, perhaps, be intimated by the expression his litteris, which I have therefore endeavoured to preserve in the translation: the letter, or a copy of it, might have been inclosed.

* See letter 10 of this book.

* When Pompeius did not exert himself as he might, to prevent Cicero's banishment.

* When, after neglecting Cicero's interests in the first instance, he afterwards was active in his recall, as he goes on to explain.

* Meaning probably Bibulus, Lucceius, and others, who had formerly been envious and jealous of Cicero, [see book iv. letter 5.] and had more recently led on Pompeius to his present fortune, and then deserted him.

entered into the town the day following, and, having harangued the people, had proceeded from thence towards Rome, and hoped to be in the city before the first of April, and then, after staying there a few days, to set out for Spain. We have thought it advisable, having for certain this account of Cæsar's motions, to send your servant back, that you might know it as soon as possible. We will attend to your instructions, and execute them as occasion requires. Trebatius Scaevola hopes to be with you in time<sup>d</sup>.

Since writing our letter we have been told that Cæsar means to pass the 25th of March at Beneventum, the 26th at Capua, the 27th at Sinuessa. We believe this may be depended upon.

LETTER XVI.

THOUGH I have nothing particular to tell you, yet, not to omit any day, I send this letter. They say that Cæsar will stop on the 27th at Sinuessa. I received a letter from him the 26th, in which he now expects every kind of assistance from me, not simply my assistance, as in his former letter. Upon my writing to commend his clemency in the affair of Cornificius, he replied in the following terms:—

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

You rightly conceive of me (for I am well known to you) that nothing can be further from my disposition than cruelty. And while I have great pleasure in the transaction itself, I rejoice with triumph that what I have done meets with your approbation. Nor does it disturb me that those whom I have set at liberty are said to have gone away in order again to make war upon me; for I wish nothing more than that I should be like myself, and they like themselves. I should be glad to have you in the city, that on all occasions I may avail myself of your advice and every kind of assistance, as I have been used to do. Let me assure you that nothing can be more agreeable to me than your Dolabella. To him accordingly I shall owe this favour<sup>e</sup>; for he cannot do otherwise, such is his kindness, his feeling, and his affection towards me.

LETTER XVII.

I WRITE this on the 28th, on which day I expect Trebatius. From his report, and from Matius's letter, I shall consider how I am to regulate my conversation with him<sup>f</sup>. O sad time! And I have no doubt but he will press me to go to the city; for he has ordered it to be publicly announced even at Formiæ, that he wishes to have a full attendance of the senate on the first of April. Must I then refuse him? But why anticipate? I will immediately write you an account of everything. From what passes between us I shall determine whether I should go to Arpinum or elsewhere. I wish to invest my young Cicero with the manly robe<sup>g</sup>, and

I think of doing it there. Consider, I beg you, what course I should take afterwards; for mainly has made me stupid. I should be glad to know if you have received from Curius any account of Tiro<sup>h</sup>. For Tiro himself has written to me in such a manner as makes me fearful how he may be; and those who come from thence only say so much, that he is going on well<sup>i</sup>. In the midst of great cares this also troubles me; for in this state of things his assistance and fidelity would be extremely useful.

LETTER XVIII.

I HAVE done both according to your advice: having ordered my discourse so that he should rather think well of me than thank me; and having adhered to my intention of not going to the city. I was mistaken in supposing that he would easily be persuaded; I never knew anybody less so. He said that he stood condemned by my resolution; and that others would be slower to comply, if I refused to attend. I replied, that their case was different from mine<sup>k</sup>. After a good deal of discussion, "Come, then," said he, "and propose terms of peace." "At my own discretion," said I. "Have I," said he, "any right to prescribe to you?" "This," I replied, "is what I shall propose: that it is not agreeable to the senate that troops should be sent to Spain, or that an army should be transported into Greece; and I shall lament at some length the situation of Pompeius." Then he—"But I do not like that to be said." "So I supposed," said I; "and for that reason I wish to absent myself; because I must either say this, and much more which it will be impossible for me to withhold if I am there; or else I must stay away." The conclusion was, that, as if he wished to get rid of the subject, he desired I would consider of it. This I could not refuse. So we parted. I imagine he was not much pleased with me; but I am pleased with myself, which I have not been for some time past. As for the rest, O gods, what an attendance! Or, as you used to say, what a ghastly troop! Among whom was the Eros<sup>l</sup> of Celer. O ruinous state! O desperate forces! What think you of Servilius<sup>m</sup> son? and Titinius's? How many have been in that very camp, by which Pompeius was besieged! Six legions! He is himself extremely vigilant and daring. I see no end of evil. Now at least you must deliver your opinion. What I have mentioned was the last thing that passed between us; yet his winding up, which I had almost omitted, was ungracious; that if he was not permitted to use my advice, he should use whose he could, and should think nothing beneath him. You see the man then, as you expressed it. "Were you grieved?" Undoubtedly. "Pray what followed?"

went directly to Pedanum, I to Arpinum. Hence I look for your warbler". "Plague on it," I will say, "do not act over again what is set: even he whom we follow" has been much appointed." But I expect your letter: for this is now as it was before, when you pressed that we should see first how this would turn out. The last subject of doubt related to our interview; in which I question not that I have seen Cæsar some offence. This is a reason for minding the quicker. Pray let me have a letter from you, and a political one. I am very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER XIX.

HAVE given my young Cicero the plain toga<sup>a</sup> Arpinum<sup>b</sup>, in preference to any other place, as there was no going to Rome: and this was kindly advised by my fellow-countrymen: though I saw people there, and wherever I passed, afflicted and downcast; so sad and so dreadful is the consolation of this great calamity. Levies are being, and troops taking up their winter-quarters. If these measures, even when adopted by good means, in prosecution of a just war, and conducted with moderation, are yet in themselves grievous; harsh do you suppose they now are, when they are adopted by desperate men, in a profligate civil war and with all insolence! For you may be sure there is not an abandoned man in Italy who is not among them. I saw myself the whole at Formiæ; and in truth never thought they deserved the name of men. I knew them all; but never seen them together. Let me away, then, as I may, and relinquish all I possess. Let me go to him, who will be more glad to see me than I had originally been of his company. For we have had the greatest hope; now, I at least have: yet, besides myself, nobody has left Italy, who did not believe Cæsar to be his enemy. And this is probably taken from some expression used by him, and meant to denote the harbinger of spring, at which season Cicero would sail.

Whom we follow," I imagine to be said by Cicero in person, thereby meaning Pompeius, though the person in which this stands is put into the mouth of Cicero.

The toga worn in mature age was without the purple which distinguished the prætoria of youth, and therefore called the plain toga, or manly toga.

Arpinum was the place of Cicero's birth, where he used to have a family seat.

I do this not for the sake of the republic, which I look upon as utterly extinguished; but that nobody may think me ungrateful towards him, who raised me out of the difficulties which he had brought upon me; and, at the same time, that I may not witness what is doing, or at least what will be done. Indeed, I imagine that some decrees of the senate have already been passed: I wish it may be in favour of Volcatius's opinion<sup>c</sup>. Yet what does it signify? for all are of one mind. But Servius will be the most to blame, who sent his son to destroy Cn. Pompeius, or at least to take him prisoner<sup>d</sup>, with Pontius Titinianus<sup>e</sup>. This latter was actuated by fear<sup>f</sup>; but the former—But let us cease to rail, and at length come to some conclusion; though I have nothing new but this, which I wish were the shortest possible, that there is life remaining<sup>g</sup>. The Adriatic Sea being closely guarded, I shall sail by the Tyrrhenian; and if the passage from Puteoli be difficult, I shall make my way to Croton, or Thurii; and, good citizens as we are, and attached to our country, shall go to infest the sea<sup>h</sup>. I see no other manner of conducting this war. We go to bury ourselves in Egypt<sup>i</sup>. We cannot be a match for Cæsar with our army; and there is no reliance on peace. But all this has been abundantly deplored. I should be glad if you would deliver to Cephalion<sup>j</sup> a letter about everything that is done, even about the conversation of people, unless they are quite dumbfounded. I have followed your advice, especially by maintaining in our interview the dignity I ought, and persisting in not going up to the city. It only remains to beg you will inform me as distinctly as possible (for there is no time to lose) what you approve, and what you think: though there is no longer any doubt. Yet if anything, or rather whatever occurs to your mind, pray let me know it.

<sup>d</sup> The fear of being ruined by Cæsar, if he had not joined him.

<sup>f</sup> That is, shall go to join Pompeius, even though his present purpose be to intercept the supplies of his country; for at that time Italy was furnished with corn by importation chiefly from Sicily and Egypt.

BOOK X.

LETTER I.

ON the 3d of April, having come to my brother's house at Laterium<sup>7</sup>, I received your letter, and was a little revived; which had not been the case since this ruination. For I most highly value your approbation of my firmness<sup>a</sup>, and conduct. And when you tell me that Sextus also approves it, I am as much pleased as if I thought I had the commendation of his father, for whose judgment I always entertained the greatest respect: who formerly said to me, what I often recollect, on that 5th of December<sup>b</sup>, when I asked him, "Sextus, what then do you advise?" "Let me not die," said he in the words of Homer, "indolently and ignobly; but after some great deed, which may be heard by generations to come." His authority therefore lives with me; and his son, who is like him, has the same weight with me which the father had. I beg you to make my kindest compliments to him. Though you defer giving your opinion to no distant period; (for I imagine that hired peace-maker<sup>c</sup> has already summed up; already something has been done in that assembly of senators; for I do not esteem it a senate;) yet by that you keep me in suspense; the less so however, because I cannot doubt of your opinion about what I ought to do<sup>d</sup>. Why else should you mention Flavius's having a legion and the province of Sicily, and that this is already carried into effect? What crimes, think you, are partly in preparation, and now contriving; partly on the point of being executed? And should I disregard that law of Solon, your fellow-citizen<sup>e</sup>, as I esteem it, and mine too, who made it a capital crime to join neither party in a civil commotion? Unless you are of a different opinion, both I and the children<sup>f</sup> shall away from hence. But one of these is more certain than the other<sup>g</sup>: I shall not however be in a hurry; I shall wait for your advice, and for the letter which I desired you would send by Cephalion<sup>h</sup>, unless you have already sent another. When you say, not that you had heard it from any other quarter; but that you thought within yourself, I should be induced to go up, if the question of peace were agitated; it has never entered into my mind that any question of peace can be agitated, while it is most certainly his wish, if possible, to deprive Pompeius of his army and province: unless perhaps that summary speaker<sup>i</sup> can persuade him to be quiet, whilst the negotiators go backwards and forwards. I see nothing now that I can hope, or think possible to be done: yet this deserves the attention of an upright man, and is a great political question; whether one should enter into the counsels of a tyrant, when he is going to deliberate on some good cause. Therefore if it should happen that I am summoned (which I do not regard: for I told him what I should say upon the subject of peace<sup>j</sup>, which he strongly reprobated), but yet if it should happen, let me know what you think I ought to do. Nothing has yet occurred which is more deserving of consideration. I am glad you were pleased with Trebatius's report; he is a good man, and a good citizen; and your own repeated expression of "excellent well," is the only thing that has hitherto given me satisfaction. I eagerly expect a letter from you, which I imagine has already been sent. You<sup>k</sup> and Sextus have maintained the same dignity which you recommend to me. Your friend Celer is more eloquent than wise. What you heard from Tullia about the young men is true. What you mention about M. Antonius<sup>l</sup>, appears to me not so bad in fact as in sound. This irresolution, in which I now am, is as bad as death: for I ought either to have acted with freedom among the ill-disposed; or, even at some hazard, to have joined the good party. "Let us either follow the rash measures of the good; or let us lash the boldness of the wicked!" Both are attended with danger: but the course I take is not dishonourable, and yet is not safe. I do not think that he<sup>m</sup> who sent his son to Brundisium on the subject of peace (about which I entertain the same sentiments as you, that it is a palpable pretence, and that war is preparing with all vigour) is likely to be appointed. Of this, as I hoped, no mention has hitherto been made<sup>n</sup>. I have therefore the less occasion to write, or even to think what I should do, in case I were appointed.

<sup>k</sup> It is doubtful to what this alludes; and indeed it is doubtful if the text be correct.

<sup>m</sup> Perhaps Balbus; the younger Balbus, who was his nephew by birth, being his son by adoption. See book viii. letter 9.

<sup>n</sup> I understand this to mean that no mention had been made of appointing anybody to negotiate with Pompeius: and he was glad of it, not because he did not wish for peace, but because he saw that all overtures for that purpose would be insincere on the part of Caesar, and only designed either to allay the clamours of some well-meaning persons in Italy, or to embarrass and cast an odium upon Pompeius.

<sup>c</sup> Who is here meant is uncertain. He appears to have been bought over by Caesar, and probably a tedious speaker, by what is said of his summing up.

LETTER II.

I RECEIVED your letter the 5th of April, which as brought by Cephalion; and had designed to main the following day at Minturnæ, and thence immediately to embark; but I stopped at my other's house in Arcanum, that, till the arrival of some surer information<sup>a</sup>, I might be less obliged, and yet everything might be done<sup>b</sup> which uld be done without me. The warbler is now ret, and I am eager to be off; no matter whither, by what passage. But this will be for my con- leration with those who understand it<sup>c</sup>. Con- ue, as far as you can, to assist me with your insels, as you have hitherto done. The state of sirs is incapable of being disentangled: every- ng must be left to fortune. I struggle without e hope. If anything better should occur, it will a surprise. I hope Dionysius has not set out come hither, as my daughter Tullia wrote me d. Not only the time is unsuitable; but I do care to have my troubles, great as they are, de an exhibition to one who is not friendly. I not however wish you to quarrel with him on account.

LETTER III.

HOUGH I have really nothing to tell you, yet is what I wanted besides to know<sup>a</sup>: whether ar was set out<sup>b</sup>; in what state he left the city, whom he had appointed over different districts offices; whether any commissioners had been by decree of the senate to treat with Pom- ; and the consuls on the subject of peace. ing therefore to know this, I have for that ose sent this letter; and I shall be obliged to o inform me about this, and anything which ay concern me to know. I shall wait in num till I hear. This is the second letter I dictated to you this same 7th of April, having n a longer the day before with my own hand<sup>c</sup>. say that you were seen in the court<sup>d</sup>; not mean to accuse you; for I am myself open e same accusation<sup>e</sup>. I am expecting to hear you, yet do not know very well what I should t. However, if there is nothing, I shall be o hear even that. Cæsar by letter excuses r not going up, and says that he takes it in art. I do not regard what he adds, that ; and Servius have complained of his not ng the same liberty to them as to me. illy men! who would send their sons to e Cn. Pompeius, yet hesitate themselves to o the senate. But I send you a copy of s letter<sup>f</sup>.

LETTER IV.

I HAVE received several letters from you the same day, all full of information; one particularly, which is equivalent to a volume, deserves to be repeatedly read, as I do<sup>a</sup>. I assure you that your pains have not been thrown away, and that I am extremely obliged to you. And as long as you can, that is, as long as you know where to find me, I earnestly beg that you will continue to write very frequently. But let us at length make an end, if possible, or some moderation, which is certainly possible, of the wailing which I daily utter. For I now no longer think of the dignity, the honours, the state of life, which I have lost; but what I have enjoyed, what I have done, in what reputation I have lived; and, even in these calamities, what difference exists between me, and those on whose account I have lost everything. These are they who, unless they had driven me from the country, thought they could not obtain the indulgence of their wishes; of whose associa- tion and wicked combination you see the issue. The one<sup>b</sup> burns with fury and wickedness, and, instead of relaxing, is daily growing more violent; first he drove him<sup>c</sup> from Italy; now he endeavours to persecute him in another<sup>d</sup> quarter, to plunder him in another<sup>e</sup> province: nor does he any longer refuse, but in some measure demands, that, as he is, so also he may be called, a tyrant. The other; he, who formerly would not so much as raise me up when I was prostrate at his feet; who said he could do nothing contrary to Cæsar's will; having escaped from the hands and sword of his father-in-law<sup>f</sup>, is preparing war by sea and land, not indeed without provocation; but however just, or even necessary, yet ruinous to his fellow-citizens, unless he conquers; calamitous even if he does conquer. Great as these generals are, I do not set their actions, nor their fortune, before my own, however flourishing they may seem, however afflicted I. For who can ever be happy, that has either abandoned his country, or enslaved it? And if, as you remind me, I have rightly said in my book<sup>g</sup>, that nothing is good but what is honourable, nothing evil but what is base; then assuredly each of those men is most wretched; both of whom have always preferred their own power and their private advantage before their country's prosperity and honour. I am therefore supported by an excellent conscience, when I reflect that I have either rendered the greatest services to my country when it was in my power; or certainly have never thought of it but with reverence; and that the republic has been overthrown by that very storm which I foresaw fourteen years ago<sup>h</sup>. I shall go then with this conscience accompanying me, in great affliction it is true; yet that, not so much on my own or on my brother's account, (for our age, whether well or otherwise, is already spent) as on account of the boys, to whom I some-

He said that the consulate had been<sup>1</sup> offered himself, but that he had declined it for the next year. There are other circumstances, also, about which I shall inquire. In conclusion, he swore, that he would easily accomplish, that Caesar ought be most friendly towards me. "For what, I pray, has Dolabella written to me?" I asked. He asserted, that when he had written to me that I would go to Rome, Caesar expressed greatest thankfulness, and not only approved, was even glad that I had acted as I did. What do you say? I have resumed my composure. For suspicion of domestic calamity, and of the conversation with Hortius, has been greatly relieved. I wish him<sup>2</sup> to prove worthy of us! And I invite myself to find some excuse<sup>3</sup> for him! it is necessary to have some communication with Hortius. There must be something; but I should be glad if it might turn out to be inconsiderable. And yet I wonder he should not have come. But we shall see how it is. You will let Oppius give credit to Terentia<sup>4</sup>. This is now only thing to be apprehended in the city. At me, however, with your advice, whether I should go by land to Rhegium, or should embark thence. But since I do not go immediately, I have something to write to you, as soon as I see Curio. Pray take care, as usual, to let me know how Tiro goes on<sup>5</sup>.

LETTER V.

My general intention I conceive I have written to you explicitly enough; respectively, nothing can be said with certainty, that it will not be before the new moon. The charge you impose upon me of regarding the young Quintus, is an Arcadian under-pretence. However, I will leave nothing untried; I wish you would do so too: but I shall not him. that I might purchase that cottage from Canuleius for 50 sestertia (400*l.*), and might have it for less, if I applied to Vectenus; I did apply to him to get some abatement, if he could, from that sum. He engaged to do so; and sent me word a little while ago, that he had bought it for 30 sestertia (240*l.*), and desired I would let him know to whom I would have it assigned; that the money was to be paid the 13th of November. I wrote to him rather angrily, yet with a familiar joke. But now, as he acts with liberality, I do not mean to find fault with him, and have written to tell him that I had been set right by you. I shall be glad to hear what you intend about your journey, and when. April 17.

LETTER VI.

NOTHING now stops me but the season. I shall use no cunning in my proceedings<sup>1</sup>, happen what may in Spain. Nevertheless keep my counsel. I have explained to you all my intentions in a former letter, for which reason this will be short; besides, I am in a hurry, and busy. Respecting young Quintus, "I take all pains"<sup>2</sup>—you know the rest. The advice you give me is both friendly and prudent; but everything will be easy, if I can only guard against him<sup>3</sup>. It is an arduous task. There are many excellent<sup>4</sup> points about him; but nothing plain, nothing candid. I wish you had undertaken to manage the young man; for his father, by his over-indulgence, undoes whatever I do. If I could act without the father's interference, I could manage him. This you can do<sup>5</sup>. But I forgive him. It is, I say, an arduous task. I have been confidently told that Pompeius is going through Illyrium to Gaul<sup>6</sup>. I must now consider how and which way I shall proceed.

LETTER VII.

I QUITE approve your going to Apulia and Sipontum, and that appearance<sup>1</sup> of unsettledness, and do not consider you to be under the same circumstances as myself. Not but we have both the same duty to perform in the republic; but that is not the question. The struggle is, who shall be king; in which the more moderate king has been driven out, he who is the better and honestest of the two, who must conquer, or the very name of the Roman people will be extinguished: yet if he conquers, he will conquer after the manner and example of Sulla. In this struggle, therefore, it is Cicero by the title of "Proconsul," [see letter 11 of this book,] in consequence of which Cicero in return called him monetalis, or "money-stamper." Cicero seems to have been displeased with the abrupt manner in which Vectenus had concluded the purchase, and fixed the day of payment, without consulting him.

not for you openly to espouse either party, but to bend to the times. But my case is a different one, being under such obligations that I cannot bear to appear ungrateful. I do not, however, think of going into the field; but of retiring into Malta, or some other place of equal insignificance. You will say, "By this you do not help him, towards whom you wish to show your gratitude: nay, perhaps he would rather have wished you did not go." But about this we shall see afterwards. Let me but get out; which Dolabella and Curio enable me to do at a better season, the one by the Adriatic sea, the other by the straits of Sicily<sup>1</sup>. I have had some hopes that Servius Sulpicius might wish to converse with me<sup>2</sup>; and I sent my freed-man Philotimus to him with a letter. If he will act a manly part, it may prove a valuable meeting; if otherwise, I shall still maintain the same character as I used to do. Curio has been staying with me, thinking that Cæsar is dejected by the popular displeasure, and himself diffident about Sicily, if Pompeius should have set sail. I have given the young Quintus a rough reception. I find it was avarice, and the hope of a handsome present. This is bad enough, but I trust there is nothing of that baseness which I had apprehended<sup>3</sup>. This fault I imagine you will attribute not to my indulgence, but to his natural disposition, while I endeavour by discipline to regulate him. You will arrange with Philotimus what you think best about the Oppii of Velia<sup>4</sup>. I shall consider Epirus as my own<sup>5</sup>; but I think of taking a different course.

LETTER VIII.

THE state of things admonishes, and you have pointed out, and I see myself, that it is time to put an end to our writing upon such subjects as it might be hazardous to have intercepted. But as my daughter Tullia frequently writes to me, begging me to wait the event of what is doing in Spain, and constantly adds that you are of the same opinion, which indeed I perceive by your letters; I have thought it not unsuitable to let you know my sentiments upon that subject. I think the advice would be prudent, if I meant to shape my conduct by the fate of Spain, which you say I ought to do. For it must necessarily happen, either that Cæsar is driven out of Spain, which I should exceedingly desire; or that the war is protracted; or that he, as he seems confidently to expect, seizes upon Spain. If he is driven out, with what grace or honour shall I then go to Pompeius, when I imagine Curio himself<sup>6</sup> will go over to him? If the war is protracted, for what am I to wait, or how long? It remains, that if we are beaten in Spain, I should be quiet. But upon this point I think otherwise. For I would sooner desert him<sup>7</sup> a conqueror, than conquered and doubtful (instead of confident) of his affairs. Inasmuch as I foresee executions if he is victorious, and violation of private property, and the recall of exiles, and cancelling of debts, and honours bestowed upon the basest men, and a kingdom such as not only no Roman, but not even any Persian can bear, is it possible for my indignation to be silent? Can my eyes sustain the sight of my delivering my opinion<sup>8</sup> in the company of Gabinus? And even of his being called upon to speak first? In the presence of your client Cælius? In that of C. Ateius's client Plaguleius? And the rest? But why do I enumerate my enemies? while I cannot without pain see in the senate my own connexions<sup>9</sup>, whom I have myself defended, nor act amongst them without shame. What if it is by no means certain that I should be allowed to do so? For his friends write me word that he is far from being satisfied with me, because I have not gone into the senate. However, I cannot entertain a thought of recommending myself to him, and that with some risk, with whom I refused to be united even with recompense. Then consider this, that the whole contest is not to be decided in Spain; unless you suppose that, upon losing this, Pompeius will throw up his arms; notwithstanding his whole plan is Themistoclean<sup>10</sup>. For he deems him who is in possession of the sea to be necessarily master of affairs. Hence, without ever striving to keep Spain by itself, he has always made naval preparations his principal care. He will accordingly sail, when the season is fit, with a prodigious fleet, and will come to Italy; where what shall I be, sitting idle? For it will no longer be allowable to be neuter. Shall I then oppose his fleet? What evil can be greater, or even so great? What indeed can be baser? Have I feebly<sup>11</sup> and alone borne his wickedness against the absent; and shall I not bear it in company with Pompeius and the other chiefs? But if, setting aside duty, we consider only the danger; there is danger from those<sup>12</sup>, if I do wrong; from him<sup>13</sup>, if I do right: nor can any plan be devised in these troubles which is free from danger. There can therefore be no doubt but I should avoid doing anything base with danger, which I would avoid even with safety. Should I not have crossed the sea along with Pompeius? It was not in my power; there is the account of the days. Besides (to confess the truth without that concealment which I might use), one thing deceived me, which perhaps ought not, but it did deceive me; for I thought there would be peace; and if this had taken place, I did not care to have Cæsar angry with me, at the time that he would be reconciled to Pompeius. For I had already felt the effects<sup>14</sup> of their union. It was through fear of this that I fell into this dilatoriness. But I shall obtain every purpose if I make<sup>15</sup> haste: if I delay, I shall lose it. And yet, my Atticus, certain auguries inspire me with confident hope; not the auguries of our college<sup>16</sup> collected by Appius, but see of Plato on the subject of tyrants. For I not see by what means he can long remain without falling off himself, even without any exertion on our part: since fresh and flourishing, in the use of six or seven days, he became the object of the bitterest hatred to that same indigent and undoned multitude; having so soon lost the precision of two things; of clemency, in the case of Metellus<sup>1</sup>; of wealth, in the affair of the treasury<sup>2</sup>. Now what companions or ministers can employ, if the provinces, if the republic is to be governed by persons, no one of whom has been able to regulate his own patrimony for two months? There is no enumerating all the particulars, which I will readily comprehend; only place them in my view, and you will presently understand that a kingdom can hardly last six months. If I am mistaken in this, I shall bear it, as many excellent men, distinguished in the republic, have borne it: unless you imagine that I would rather like Sardanapalus in his bed<sup>3</sup>, than in a Theban exile: who being, as Thucydides says, the ablest to apprehend things present, after the best consultation; and far the best to counsel of things to come, what was likely to take place; yet fell into those straits, which he would have avoided, if nothing had deceived him. Though as one who, in the words of the same author, eminently foresaw advantages and disadvantages; yet they were yet in obscurity; yet he did not know either how to escape the envy of the Lacedæmonians, or that of his own fellow-citizens, nor what he was promising to Artaxerxes. That night would not have been so calamitous to the prudent Africanus; that day of Sulla's superiority so sad to the prudent C. Marius; if nothing had deceived them. Nevertheless I support my opinion by the augury I have mentioned. This does not deceive me; still it turns out otherwise. He must fall either by his enemies, or by himself, who indeed is his worst enemy. I hope this may happen during my life, though it is time for me to think of that, not of this short life. But should anything happen to me sooner than I expect, it signifies nothing whether I see it done, or foresee that it will be.

This being so, it is not to be borne, that I submit to those against whom the senate has pronounced with authority to see that the republic be no detriment<sup>4</sup>. To you I commend all my concerns; though such is your affection to me that they need not my commendation. But I have nothing to tell you; for I sit here waiting for an opportunity to sail. Yet never so demanded to be told, as that of all your kindred kindnesses none was at any time more agreeable to me than the sweet and assiduous attention you have bestowed on my dear Tullia. She is to me self highly gratified by it; and I no less so. Excellence is indeed wonderful. How does she bear public misfortunes! How her own domestic embarrassments! And what a courage does she show at my departure! Call it natural affection, the completest union of minds; yet she would have me do what is right, and be well esteemed. But of this too much, lest I call forth my own sensibility. If you hear anything certain about Spain, or anything else, while I remain in Italy, you will write to me. And at my departure, I shall perhaps send again to you; and the rather, because Tullia seemed to think you would not at present leave Italy. I must manage to get Antonius's consent, as well as Curio's, to my residing at Malta, without taking a part in this war. I wish I may find him as accommodating and kind to me as Curio. He<sup>5</sup> is said to be coming to Misenum the 2d of May, that is to-day; but he has sent before an ungracious letter, of which I inclose a copy.

UNLESS I had a great regard for you, indeed much greater than you imagine, I should not have minded the report which is spread about you, especially as I do not believe it; yet loving you as I do, I cannot dissemble that the very rumour, however unfounded, greatly affects me. I cannot think that you will cross the sea, considering your affection for Dolabella and your daughter, that accomplished woman, and the esteem in which you are held by all of us<sup>6</sup>, to whom indeed your dignity and splendour are almost dearer than to yourself. But I have not thought it the part of a friend to be indifferent to what is said even by ill-disposed persons; and I have acted with the greater zeal, because I consider the task imposed upon me to be the more difficult, owing to the offence which has arisen between us<sup>7</sup>, rather from my jealousy than from any injury on your part. For I would have you believe that, excepting my Cæsar, nobody is dearer to me than you, and that at the same time I am persuaded Cæsar esteems M. Cicero among his best friends. Therefore I beg you, my Cicero, to take no hasty step,—but to distrust the attachment of one<sup>8</sup>, who first injured you that he might afterwards confer a kindness; and on the other hand not to run away from one<sup>9</sup> who, though he should not love you (which, however, cannot be the case), yet would wish you to be in safety and in honour. I have expressly sent to you my intimate friend Calpurnius, that you may be assured of the great interest I take in your life and dignity.

The same day Philotimus brought the following letter from Cæsar.

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

THOUGH I was persuaded that you would do nothing rashly or imprudently, yet I have been moved by common report to write to you, and to request, by the intimacy between us, that you would not in this declining state of affairs take any step which you did not think it necessary to take in their sound state. For you will both inflict a severer blow on our friendship, and less well consult your own advantage, if you appear to be influenced not by the course of events (for everything seems to have fallen out most favourable to us, most adverse to them), nor by attachment to the cause (for that was the same when you judged it proper to abstain from their counsels), but by condemnation of some act of mine,—than which you can do nothing more painful to me. That you may not do it I beg of you, by the right of our friendship. Besides, what can be more proper for a good and peaceable man and a good citizen than to abstain from civil broils? This some who would wish it cannot do because of the danger; you, to whom the testimony of my life and the assurance of my friendship are well known, will never find anything either more secure or more honourable than to abstain from all hostility. April 16. On my journey.

LETTER IX.

THE arrival of Philotimus (what a fellow he is! how silly! how often misrepresenting in favour of Pompeius!) has frightened to death all my companions. As for myself, I am become callous. None of our people entertained a doubt of "Cæsar's having checked his progress;" whereas he is said to advance with the utmost speed: and that "Petreius had joined Afranius," though he brings no intelligence of the kind. In short it was even believed that Pompeius was passing with a great force through Illyrium into Germany; for this was confidently asserted. I am of opinion, therefore, that I ought to get away to Malta, till we see what is done in Spain. From Cæsar's letter it appears as if I might almost do this with his consent; for he says that I can do nothing more honourable or more safe than to withdraw from all contention. You will say then, "where is that resolution which you professed in your last letter." It is here, and it is unaltered. But I wish it were possible to determine only at my own risk. The tears of my family sometimes soften me, when they entreat me to await the issue of the war in Spain. The boys could not without great emotion read a letter from M. Cælius written in a lamentable strain, and entreating me to wait for the same event, and not to betray so rashly my fortunes, my only daughter, and all my connexions. My own son, indeed, is of greater spirit, and for that very reason affects me the more, and seems to be anxious only about my reputation. To Malta, therefore: thence whither it shall seem prudent. Do you, however, even now let me hear from you, especially if there is any news of Afranius. If I have any conversation with Antonius, I will let you know what has been done: but, as you advise, I shall be cautious in trusting him; for<sup>1</sup> the means of concealing my design are both difficult and dangerous. I expect Servius on the seventh of May, for whom I shall wait, at the desire of Postumia<sup>1</sup> and the young Servius. I rejoice to hear that your ague is better. I send you a copy of Cælius's letter.

Cælius to Cicero.

I AM distressed by your letter, in which you show that your thoughts are engaged about nothing but what is sad. What this is you do not expressly say; nevertheless you sufficiently declare the nature of what you contemplate. I therefore write this letter to you without loss of time, to beg and beseech you, Cicero, by your fortunes, by your children, not to adopt any measure prejudicial to your happiness and security. For I call the gods, and men, and our friendship, to witness that I have told you beforehand, and have given you this counsel not hastily, but have informed you after being with Cæsar, and knowing what his disposition would be should he gain the victory,—if you imagine that Cæsar will continue to observe the same moderation in liberating his adversaries and submitting to their conditions, you are mistaken. His thoughts, and indeed his declarations, breathe nothing but what is severe and cruel. He went away much out of humour with the senate, and thoroughly provoked by the opposition to his wishes<sup>2</sup>. There will assuredly be no room for mercy. Therefore, if you have any regard for yourself, for your only son, for your family, for your remaining hopes,—if I, if that excellent man your son-in-law, have any weight with you, you ought not wilfully to disturb their fortune,—so that we should be obliged to hate, or relinquish, that cause in the success of which our happiness consists, or else entertain the impious wish of injuring you. Lastly, think what offence you must already have given<sup>3</sup> by your delay. But now, to oppose Cæsar in the time of victory, whom you were unwilling to offend while his cause was doubtful, and to join those in their flight whom you refused to follow as long as they resisted, is the height of folly. Take care that while you are ashamed to be wanting in the duties of the best citizen, you are not too negligent in choosing what is the best course. But if I cannot entirely prevail with you, at least wait till it is known how we go on in Spain; which, I announce to you, will be ours upon the arrival of Cæsar. What hope they may have after Spain is lost I know not: and what can be your object in uniting with a desperate cause, I cannot for my life discover. This, which without saying it you gave me to understand, Cæsar had heard; and as soon as he had asked me how I did, he mentioned what he had heard about you. I professed my ignorance; but begged him to write to you in such a manner as might be most likely to induce you to stay. He takes me with him to Spain. If this were not so before I went to the city, wherever you were, I would have run down to you and argued the point with you in person, and used my utmost endeavour to keep you. Consider, Cicero, again and again, that you may not utterly ruin yourself and all your family, nor plunge yourself, with your eyes open, into a situation from whence you see no retreat. But if the language of the best citizens affects you, or if you cannot bear the insolence and haughtiness of certain persons, you may choose, I think, some town free in war while these matters are deciding, which I presently be concluded. If you do this I shall think you have acted wisely, and you will give no offence to Caesar.

LETTER X.

BLIND that I am, not to have foreseen this! I read you Antonius's letter. Having repeatedly shown to him that I entertained no designs against your measures,—that I was mindful of my in-law, mindful of our friendship,—that if I might otherwise I might have been with Pompeius, that I wished to be out of the way, because I do not like to be running about with my lictors,—this measure, however, was not even now decided. To these observations see how superfluously he replies:—

How true are your professions! For one who is to be neuter remains in his country; he who away appears to pass judgment upon one of us. But I am not the person to determine whether anybody is at liberty to go away or not. You have laid this duty upon me, that I should let nobody at all to leave Italy. My approving intention is, therefore, of little consequence, I have no authority to remit anything. I think should apply to Caesar, and ask leave from him. I do not doubt but you will obtain it, especially as you promise to observe the relations of friendship.

There is a Spartan despatch<sup>1</sup> for you! I shall not mean to deceive the man. He was to come on the evening of the third, that is to-day; therefore to-morrow he may perhaps call upon me. I endeavour to appear in no hurry<sup>2</sup>. I shall let out that I mean to apply to Caesar: I shall let myself somewhere with very few attendants, and will certainly fly away from hence in spite of people. I wish it may be to Curio<sup>3</sup>; this I leave to you, God willing. I have received a great deal of uneasiness. Something worthy of me is accomplished. I am exceedingly sorry for my loss. Attend to it, I beseech you, while it is recent. I was pleased with your account of the people at Marseilles<sup>4</sup>! I beg to be informed of anything you may hear. I should like Sicily, if I might go openly; which I had obtained from you.

I wait here for Servius, as I am requested to bring my wife and son, and as I think it expedient. I now takes Cytheris<sup>5</sup> with him in an open boat; a second conveys his wife; and there are seven others together, of his girls think you? See by how vile a death we perish; and if you can, of the havoc he<sup>6</sup> will make, if he come back conquered or conqueror.

The original is expressed in two Greek words, signifying a particular kind of cipher used by the government, to which their generals were expected to pay obedience.

The text is evidently corrupt; but I read it with the edition—Tentabo autem nihil properare. I would be glad to get to Sicily under the command of who, though of Caesar's party, was personally to Cicero. From thence Cicero would proceed to is said perhaps from a feeling of some dissatisfaction he had hitherto acted. He shut their gates against Caesar. Cytheris was Antonius's mistress.

But I, if there should be no ship, will go even in a cock-boat, to snatch myself from the violence of these people. I will write more after I have seen him. I cannot help loving our young nephew, though I plainly see that I am not loved by him. I never saw anything so intractable, so set against his family, so absorbed in his own conceit. What an incredible weight of troubles! I will, however, and do, take pains to correct him; for he has excellent abilities<sup>7</sup>, but requires great attention to his temper.

LETTER XI.

AFTER sealing my last letter, I did not choose to deliver it to the person I had intended, because he was not one of my own servants. For this reason it was not delivered that day. In the mean time Philotimus arrived, and brought me yours; in which what you say about my brother certainly shows a want of steadiness; but has nothing insincere, nothing fraudulent, nothing that may not be turned to good, nothing that you may not by a single word lead whither you will. In short, he is affectionate towards all his friends, even those with whom he often quarrels; and me he loves better than himself. I do not blame him for sending a different<sup>8</sup> account to you about your nephew, and to the mother about her son. What you mention about the journey, and about your sister, is vexatious, and the more so, because my time is so contracted that it is not in my power to remedy it; for remedy it I certainly would. But you see in what troubles and difficulties I am. The money concerns are not such (for I often hear from him) that he does not wish to pay you, and is earnest to do so. But if Q. Axius, in this my flight, does not repay me thirteen sestertia (100*l.*) which I lent to his son, but excuses himself on account of the times; if Lepta, if others do the same; I cannot forbear wondering, when I hear from him that he is pressed for some 20 sestertia (160*l.*). For you see the difficulties. He has ordered, however, that the money may be provided for you. Do you think him slow, or backward, in such affairs? Nobody is less so. But enough about my brother. Respecting his son, it is true that his father always indulged him: but indulgence does not make one deceitful, or covetous, or without natural affection; though it may perhaps create haughtiness, and arrogance, and moroseness. Accordingly he has these faults also, which arise from indulgence; but they are supportable; for why should I add, at his time of life? But the former, which to me who love him are more grievous than these very calamities in which I am placed, are not the effects of our tenderness; no, they have roots of their own; which, however, I would pluck out if it were possible. But the times are such that I must put up with everything. My own son I easily restrain; for nothing is more tractable; and it is in compassion to him that I have hitherto adopted less vigorous counsels; and the more he wishes me to exert myself, the more I am afraid of injuring him. Antonius arrived yesterday evening. He may perhaps soon call upon me; or he may not even do that; as he wrote to explain his wishes. But you shall know immediately what is done. I must now conduct everything secretly. What shall I do about the boys? Shall I trust them to a small row-boat? What inclination do you imagine I shall have for sailing? For I remember, even in summer time, how uneasy I was sailing with that open vessel of the Rhodians: what do you suppose then will be the case in this severe season with a little barge? It is every way a sad state. Trebatius is with me, a thoroughly honest man, and good citizen. What monstrous things does he relate! Immortal gods! Does Balbus also think of coming into the senate? But I shall to-morrow get him to carry a letter to you himself. I am ready to believe Vectenus is kindly disposed towards me, as you say. I had joked with him a little angrily for having written to me so peremptorily about providing the money<sup>a</sup>. If he received this otherwise than he ought, you will soften it. I addressed him coiner, because he had addressed me proconsul. But since he is an honest man, and friendly towards me, I am ready also to be friendly towards him.

LETTER XII.

WHAT will become of me? Or who is there not only more unfortunate, but more disgraced, than I am? Antonius says that he has received orders<sup>a</sup> about me by name. He has not however yet seen me, but mentioned this to Trebatius. What can I do now? Nothing prospers with me; and what has been considered with the greatest care, turns out the most unhappily. For when I had gained Curio, I thought I had obtained everything. He had written to Hortensius<sup>b</sup> about me; and Reginus was entirely with me. I never suspected that Antonius would have anything to do with this sea<sup>c</sup>. Which way shall I now turn myself? I am beset on all sides. But enough of lamentation. I must sail then unseasonably, and creep unobserved into some merchant-ship. I must not let it seem as if I were stopped with my own concurrence<sup>d</sup>. I must endeavour to get to Sicily; which if I accomplish, I shall pursue something further. Let but things go on well in Spain. Though about Sicily itself, I wish the news may be true; but hitherto nothing has happened favourably. It is reported that a concourse of Sicilians assembled round Cato, entreating him to resist, and promising everything; and that he was moved by it, and began to levy troops. I do not believe it, however illustrious be its author. That the province might be kept, I know. But we shall soon have news from Spain. We have here C. Marcellus intent upon the same purpose<sup>e</sup>, or excellently feigning it: though I have not seen him myself, but hear it from one who is intimate with him. Pray let me hear if you have anything new. If I make any attempt, I will immediately write to you. I shall deal severely with young Quintus: I wish I may be able to do any good. But do you tear the letters in which I have said anything harshly of him, for fear of some disclosure: I will do the same with yours. I am waiting for Servius, yet do not expect from him any sound advice. You shall know whatever is the result. It must doubtless be confessed that I have committed errors. But is it once only? and on one occasion? Nay, everything, the more it has been considered, the more imprudently has it been done. But, as Homer says, "what is past, we must let be, however sorry:" in what remains, let us only not rush on our ruin. You bid me be circumspect in my departure. In what respect should I be circumspect? All the accidents that can occur are so manifest, that if I would avoid them, I must sit down in shame and grief; if I should neglect them, I am in danger of falling into the hands of abandoned men. But see in what great difficulties I am. I sometimes think it would be desirable to sustain even some severe injury from these people, that it may appear how hateful I am to the tyrant. If the course I had hoped were open to me, I would have accomplished something, as you wish and exhort, that should justify my delay. But the guard that is kept is surprising; and I have some suspicions even of Curio himself. I must act therefore either by force or by stealth: and if by force, I shall perhaps have to contend also with the seas. But by stealth, is by stealth from these people; in which if there should be any failure, you see what disgrace impends. But I am drawn on, and must not recede through fear of some outrage. I often think with myself about Cælius<sup>f</sup>; and, should I have any similar opportunity, I shall not let it slip. I hope that Spain is steady. The affair of Marseilles, as it is noble in itself, so is it an argument with me that all is right in Spain; for they would not show such resolution if it were otherwise; and they would know the truth, being so near and vigilant. You rightly take notice of the disapprobation expressed in the theatre. I perceive also, that the legions which he took up in Italy are very much dissatisfied. But yet nothing is more hostile, than he is to himself. You justly fear his breaking out into violence. If he is driven to despair, he will certainly do so. This increases the propriety of effecting something in the same spirit as Cælius, but I should hope with better success. But everything in its turn: whatever is done first, you shall immediately know it. I will, as you desire, do what I can for the young man<sup>g</sup>, and will support the weight of the whole Peloponnesus<sup>h</sup>: for he has good parts, if there were but any disposition susceptible of instruction. Hitherto he shows none; yet there may be; or virtue is not to be taught; which I can never believe.

<sup>f</sup> The Cælius here spoken of has been supposed to be one C. Cælius Calpurnius, who endeavoured, but in vain, to check the progress of Sylla in the former civil wars; but I do not find that this conjecture rests on any certain foundation. See letter 14 of this book.

LETTER XIII.

OUR letter was particularly acceptable to my Tullia, and indeed to me. Your letters always give something agreeable with them. Write, therefore; and if you can offer any ground of hope, do not omit it. You need not be alarmed at Antonius's lions<sup>1</sup>. Nothing is pleasanter than this. Listen to a trait worthy of a minister of state. He summoned the council of ten<sup>2</sup> from the towns; and the four magistrates came to his house early in the morning. First, he was present till nine o'clock: then, upon being told that Neapolitans and Cumans were arrived (for he was displeased with these people), he ordered them to come again the next day, as he wanted to see them, and was taking a lament. This he did to-day: and to-day he has determined to go to Ænaria<sup>3</sup>. He promises to recall those that have been banished<sup>4</sup>. But omitting these matters, I say something about myself. I have had a letter from Axius<sup>5</sup>. I am obliged to you for what you have done about Tiro. I am quite satisfied with Vectenus. I have paid the money<sup>6</sup> to Antonius. Servius is said to have slept at Minerva's temple the 6th of May; to-day he was to lodge with Marcus Cælius in Linternum; he will therefore reach early to-morrow, and will furnish me with matter for writing to you; for I now find nothing to write. I am surprised that Antonius should not have sent a message to me, especially as he has always been very civil. I suppose he does not wish to deny before my face his having received my command concerning me. But I should not expect any favour<sup>7</sup>; nor, if I obtained it, should I have any reliance upon it. Yet I must devise something. Pray let me know if anything is done in this matter; for it might be heard by this time; everybody is anxious, as supposing that, if I go right, there will be no further trouble. On my part, I neither think that the preservation of Spain will decide the business, nor its loss make it desperate. I imagine Silius, and Ocella, and others, are obliged to delay their departure. Give too that you are hindered by Curtius<sup>8</sup>; I suppose you have a passport.

Antonius is reported, but at a subsequent period, to have taken lions to his carriage. He may at least have shown fondness for them, and carried them about with him this time. Cicero seems to mean that Antonius assumed so little of the character of the lion, that he descended to amuse himself with low humour, beneath the dignity of his situation.

The original there appears to have been some Greek which has undergone such mutilation from copyists and commentators, as to baffle all reasonable interpretation. The 17th letter of this book, which seems to have to do with this, makes it probable that Cicero meant in

LETTER XIV.

O WRETCHED existence! For to remain so long in fear, is a greater evil than the thing itself which is feared. Servius, as I before mentioned, having arrived the 7th of May, came to me the next day. Not to detain you unnecessarily, we came to no conclusion. I never saw anybody more disturbed by apprehension; nor in truth did he fear anything that was not a just cause of fear. That man<sup>1</sup> was angry with him, this<sup>2</sup> by no means pleased; and the victory of either party was to be dreaded, owing to the cruel disposition of the one<sup>3</sup>, the audacity of the other<sup>4</sup>, and the pecuniary difficulties of both, from which they can never be extricated but through the property of private individuals. This he said with so many tears, that I wondered they had not been dried up by such protracted misery. As for me, even this weakness of the eyes, which prevents my writing with my own hand, is unattended with any weeping<sup>5</sup>, though it is often so troublesome as to keep me awake. Collect, therefore, what consolation you can, and send it me; not from books and philosophy; for that I have at home; though somehow the remedy is less powerful than the disease: but do you rather find out what relates to Spain, and to Marseilles. Servius brings a sufficiently good report on these subjects, and says there is good authority for that of the two legions<sup>6</sup>. Let me then hear this from you, if you can, and other things of the same kind. Something must necessarily be known in a few days. But I revert to Servius. We adjourned our conversation to the next day. But he is loath to go out of the country. He would sooner bear whatever might happen, in his bed. He has a painful scruple arising from his son's joining the army before Brundisium<sup>7</sup>. This, however, he positively asserted, that if the exiles were restored, he would go into banishment himself. To this I replied, that that would certainly take place; and that what was now doing was not at all better; and I produced many instances. But this, instead of giving him encouragement, increased his fear; so that now it seems necessary rather to keep him in ignorance of my purpose, than to invite him to do the same. Therefore, there is not much to be expected from him. I shall think of Cælius, according to your suggestion.

LETTER XV.

WHILE Servius was with me, Cephalio arrived with your letter, on the tenth; which brought us great hope of better things respecting the eight cohorts; for they also which are in these parts, are said to waver. On the same day Funisulanus brought another letter from you, corroborating the same circumstance. On the subject of his own business I satisfied him amply, giving him to understand all his obligation to you. He has not yet paid me. He owes me a considerable sum, and is not supposed to be rich. He now says that he will pay it; but that one, who is in his books, delays: that, when this is paid, if there should be sufficient at your house, you may send it by the messengers. Philotimus's freed-man, Eros, will tell you how much it is. But let us return to greater matters. That Cælian business, which you wish for, ripens apace; and I am distracted with doubt whether I should wait for a favourable wind. There wants but a standard, and people will flock to it*. I am quite of your mind in thinking it best to go openly<sup>a</sup>, and I think to set off accordingly: but I shall first wait for another letter from you. Nothing is to be got from Servius's opinion: every objection is raised to every proposal. He is the only man I have known of a more timid disposition than C. Marcellus, who regretted that he had been made consul. How dishonourable! He is said too to have confirmed Antonius in his opposition to my departure, that he might himself, I suppose, remain with the better grace. Antonius set out for Capua the tenth. He sent me word that he was prevented from waiting upon me by shame, because he thought I should be angry with him. I shall go then, and in the manner you advise, unless any hope should previously be afforded of sustaining some more important character<sup>b</sup>. But this can scarcely happen so soon. Allienus the prætor however thinks that one of his colleagues will be appointed, if I am not. I care not who it is, so there be but somebody. I am pleased with what you mention about your sister. I take pains about young Quintus; and hope things are better. As for my brother Quintus, I assure you he is making every exertion to pay the interest that is due; but he has hitherto squeezed nothing out of L. Egnatius<sup>c</sup>. Axius<sup>d</sup> modestly applies for 12,000 (100*l.*); for he has frequently written to desire I would advance to Gallius whatever he wants. But if he had not written, could I do otherwise? In truth I have repeatedly promised: but this money he wants immediately. I wish people* would have consideration for me in these troubles. May the gods confound them! But of this at some other time. I rejoice at your being freed from your ager, and also Pilia. While the stores and other things are putting on board, I mean to run down to Pospeianum. I should be glad if you would make my acknowledgments to Vectenus for his attention. If you have anybody to send, let me hear from you before I go.

LETTER XVI.

I HAD just sent you a letter on a variety of subjects, when Dionysius came to me at an early hour. I should not only have shown myself ready to forgive him, but should have remitted the whole, if he had come in the temper of mind you described. For in the letter I received from you at Arpinum, you said that he would come, and would do whatever I desired. Now I desired, or rather wished, to have him with me. This he had positively refused, when he came to Formianum, which occasioned me to write to you angrily about him. He said very little; but the amount of his harangue was, that I would forgive him; that he was so embarrassed with his own affairs, that he was unable to go with me. I replied in a few words, but felt great vexation. I saw clearly that he despised my present fortune. What think you? Perhaps you will be surprised; but I must tell you that I reckon this among the greatest vexations of these times. I would have him continue your friend. The wishing you this, is wishing that all may go well with you: for just so long will his attachment last. I trust my design will be unattended with danger; for I shall both dissemble, and mean to keep a sharp look-out. Let but the passage be such as I wish: for the rest, so far as it is under the control of prudence, due care shall be taken. While I remain here, I should be glad if you would write me word not merely of what you know, or have heard, but also of what you foresee will happen. Cato, who might have kept Sicily without any difficulty, (and if he had kept it, all respectable people would have flocked to him) went from Syracuse the 24th of April, as Curio wrote me word. I wish, what is said, that Cotta may keep Sardinia. There is such a report. If it be so, poor Cato! In order to lessen any suspicion of my departure, or of my design, I went to Pompeianum the 12th, that I might remain there, while the things requisite for the voyage were got ready. Upon my arrival at the house, information was brought me that the centurions of three cohorts which are at Pompeii wished me to go thither the next day; it was my friend Ninnius communicated this to me; that they wished to deliver themselves and the town to me. But I, look you, was off on the morrow before it was light, that they might not so much as see me. For what was there in three cohorts? What if there had been more? How were they furnished? There occurred to me the same ideas upon that Cælian attempt which I read in the letter I received from you the same day, as soon as I arrived at Camerum; and yet it might only have been done to try me. I therefore removed all suspicion. Upon my <sup>a</sup> Atticus, we have seen, succeeded to the property of Cecilius, who was a sort of banker; and I imagine the same business to have been continued on Atticus's account. Hence I understand this passage to mean, that if Funisulanus, after the money that was owing to him should have been paid, had enough at Atticus's banking-house to answer Cicero's claims, it might be sent down to him. [See book viii. letter 7, note <sup>a</sup>.] This receives considerable weight from what occurs in several letters of book xii., from which it appears that Atticus was a long time engaged with his accounts, so as to show that they must have been voluminous and intricate.

<sup>b</sup> This may either mean, that there were many people dissatisfied with Cæsar, and ready to unite under any leader in opposition to him: or, that many people were desirous of leaving Italy as soon as an opportunity offered.

<sup>f</sup> Axius is mentioned before, in letter 11 of this book, as owing Cicero 13,000 sestertii on account of his son, who is probably the same Gallius here spoken of. And now he says, that Axius, instead of repaying the money, borrows 12,000 more, and wants it immediately.

<sup>g</sup> Adversus seems to be used absolutely, in the manner explained in book iv. letter 3, note <sup>h</sup>.

urn I find Hortensius has been here, and called pay his respects to Terentia. He used very honourable language towards me. But I suppose I shall see him; for he sent his servant to say that he would call upon me. This is better than my colleague Antonius, whose mistress is carried in a chair in the midst of his lictors<sup>4</sup>. Since you are free from the ague, and have shaken off not only disease but even the languor attending it, let me see you in Greece looking quite well. In the meantime let me hear something from you.

LETTER XVII.

Hortensius came to me the 14th, after my letter was written. I wish the rest of his conduct corresponded with this. His attention towards me is inconceivable, and of this I mean to avail myself<sup>5</sup>. Afterwards came Serapio<sup>6</sup> with your letter. But before I opened it, I told him that you had already written to me about him, as you had written to me. Then, when I had read the letter, I entered into the matter very fully; and in truth I am much pleased with him, for he seems to be at once a man of learning and of probity. I think of employing him in several other ways also, and taking him with me. The necessity of my eyes has frequent returns, and is not very troublesome, yet it prevents my writing. I am glad your health is now both freed from its old complaint, and strengthened against any fresh attacks. I wish I had Ocella<sup>7</sup> for these matters seem to be rather more difficult. At present I am stopped by the equinox, which is very much out of its natural course<sup>8</sup>. If it flows gently, I hope Hortensius will continue the same disposition, for hitherto nothing could be kinder. You are surprised at my having no passport<sup>9</sup>, as if I were charging with I know not what offence; and can imagine how it should have come into my mind.

But as you had mentioned an intention of going away, and I had understood that nobody was to go without one, therefore I concluded that I had one; as likewise because you had got a passport for the boys. This was the reason of the

LETTER XVIII.

My dear Tullia was brought to bed the 19th of May of a seven months' child. I rejoice in her safe delivery. The child is very weakly. The calms have hitherto delayed me surprisingly, and have been a greater impediment than the watch which is kept over me. For Hortensius's professions are all idle words, so that he must be a most base man. He has been corrupted by the freed-man Salvius. Henceforward therefore I shall not write to inform you what I am going to do, but what I have done. For all the Corycæi<sup>1</sup> seem to listen to what I say. But still if there is anything from Spain, or anything else, pray continue to write; and do not expect to hear from me till I arrive at my destination, unless I send to you on my passage. But I write even this with fear: so slowly and difficultly has everything hitherto been done. As I laid ill the first beginning, so the rest follows. I am now proceeding to Formiæ. The Furies will perhaps pursue me by the same route. From the conversation which Balbus had with you, I do not approve of Malta. Do you then doubt of his reckoning me among the number of the enemies? I have written myself to Balbus, telling him that you had informed me of his good-will, and of his suspicion. For the one I have returned my thanks; on the other subject you must excuse me to him. Did you ever know anybody more unfortunate? I say no more, that I may not also distress you. I am worried to death with thinking that a time is arrived, when neither courage nor prudence can any longer avail me.

[In the interval between the tenth and eleventh books of Cicero's letters, it appears that he actually quitted Italy the 11th of June, and passed over to Dyrrachium, with his brother and the two young Ciceros, to join Pompeius. In the mean time Caesar had made himself master of Spain; and having been created dictator at Rome, marched to Brundisium, and thence embarked the 4th of January in pursuit of Pompeius. At first Pompeius obtained some advantage over Caesar before Dyrrachium, but was soon after totally defeated in the memorable battle of Pharsalia. Cicero was not present on this occasion, but remained at Dyrrachium out of health, and out of spirits. After this defeat Pompeius's party dispersed. The greater part went to renew the war in Africa, whither Caesar also followed them. Some retired into Greece; but Cicero returned to Brundisium about the end of October, and from thence wrote the 5th letter of the following book.]

BOOK XI.

LETTER I.

I HAVE received from you a sealed packet<sup>a</sup> brought by Anteros; but from which I have been able to learn nothing of my domestic affairs, about which I am deeply concerned. For he<sup>b</sup> who has had the management of them is not there, nor do I know where in the world he is. But I place all hope of my reputation and private concerns in your kindness, which I have so often experienced. This if you will extend to me in these sad and desperate times, I shall bear with a better heart the dangers which are common to me with the rest; and that you will do so I conjure and entreat you. I have two-and-twenty hundred sestertia (17,600*l.*) in cistophori<sup>c</sup> in Asia; by exchanging which money you will easily support my credit. Had I not thought that I left it quite clear, trusting to him<sup>d</sup> whom you have long since ceased to trust, I would have waited a little longer, and not left my private affairs in embarrassment. The reason of my writing to you so late, is, that I have been late in finding what I had to apprehend. I beg you again and again to take me wholly under your protection; that if those, with whom I am<sup>e</sup>, are safe, I may escape along with them, and may owe my safety to your kindness.

LETTER II.

I RECEIVED your letter the 4th of February, and the very same day I formally accepted the inheritance<sup>a</sup> according to the will. Out of my many sad troubles one is removed, if, as you say, this inheritance is adequate to the support of my credit and reputation; which, however, even without this, I understand that you would have defended from your own means. As to what you mention respecting the dower<sup>b</sup>, by all the gods I conjure you to take the whole affair under your management, and to protect that poor creature<sup>c</sup> (who is suffering by my fault and negligence) out of my property, if I have any; or by any means you can employ without putting yourself to inconvenience. Do not, I beseech you, suffer her to remain, as you say, destitute of everything. On what expenses has the produce of the farms been consumed? Nobody ever told me that those sixty sestertia (480*l.*) which you mention had been deducted from her dower; for I never would have suffered it. But this is the least of the injuries which I have received<sup>a</sup>, and which my grief and tears prevent me from detailing to you. Of the money which I had in Asia, I have drawn out nearly one half<sup>b</sup>. I thought it would be safer where it is than with the public renters<sup>c</sup>. When you exhort me to keep up my spirits, I wish you could suggest anything that might enable me to do so. But if to my other miseries is added that also which Chrysippus said was in contemplation (you have not mentioned it) respecting my house<sup>d</sup>, who is there more wretched than myself? I pray and beseech you, pardon me. I cannot write any more. You see how greatly I am afflicted. If this were common to me with the rest, who seem to be in the same case, my fault would not appear so great, and would therefore be the more tolerable. There is now no source of comfort; unless you devise something, if indeed anything can be devised, that I may not be exposed to any peculiar calamity and insult. I have been later in sending back the courier, because there was no opportunity of sending. I have received from your agents seventy sestertia (568*l.*) in money, and the clothing<sup>e</sup> that was wanted. I should be glad if you would write in my name to whom you think proper: you know my friends. If they expect my seal, or signature, you may tell them that I have avoided this, on account of the watch that is kept<sup>f</sup>.

LETTER III.

WHAT is doing here you will be able to learn from the bearer of this letter, whom I have kept the longer because I have been in daily expectation of something new; though at present I have no other reason for writing, than that, about which you desired an answer, respecting what I would have done relative to the first of July<sup>a</sup>. Either alternative is attended with difficulty in such difficult times; the risk of so large a sum; or, in this doubtful issue of events, that breaking off<sup>b</sup> which mention. Therefore as other things, so this especially I commit to your protection and kindness, and to her judgment and inclination. I could have done better for my poor daughter, if I had formerly deliberated with you in person, rather than by letter, on the subject of my own utility and circumstances. When you deny that peculiar disadvantage attaches to me, though it affords no consolation, yet there are many similar circumstances which you must see to be, they are, very grievous, and which I might easily avoid. But these very things will be less, as has hitherto been done, they are lightened by your care and attention. The money is with Eggius. Let it remain on my account, as it is, (for Eggius cannot long continue in their present state), I may be able to see what is most expedient; though I am in want of everything; because he is with whom I am in difficulties, and I have trusted him a large sum of money, thinking that in matters are settled, this may likewise be an aid to me. I should be glad, if there are any persons to whom you think I ought to write, that you would execute this, as you have done before. Pray my compliments to your family, and take care of your health. In the first place make every care provision for what you mention; that nothing be wanting to her for whom you know how ready I am. From the camp, June 13th.

<sup>g</sup> This was probably the day on which some portion of his daughter's fortune became due to Dolabella. Cicero, as well as Tullia, was dissatisfied with Dolabella, and meditated a divorce. But considering Dolabella's credit with Caesar, it was difficult to determine, in the present doubtful state of affairs, whether to incur the danger of losing so large a sum, if he paid it; or to cut the matter short by suing for a divorce, and thereby making Dolabella his enemy.

LETTER IV.

RECEIVED a letter by Isidorus, and two of dates. From the last I find that the estates have not been sold. You will therefore see that matter will be supported through you. With respect to the usinas, if only I survive, it will be a constant possession for me. You desire me to write, I am prevented by want of matter, for I have nothing worth writing; entirely disapproving, as I know what happens, and what is doing. I wish I could formerly consulted you in person, rather than by letter. I support your cause here among these persons as well as I can. Celer will tell you the same.

I have hitherto declined all office, the more because it was impossible to do anything as long as I am in my circumstances. You ask what has happened: you will be able to learn from Eggius. What remains does not appear to be difficult. I should be glad to have you take up as you promise, and as you do) of what you I have especially at heart. I am worn out with anxiety, which has also brought on extreme weakness. As soon as this is removed, I will join the leader of the business, who is in at sea, on the propriety of his own going to join us. See the following letter.

A subsequent part of the letter appears to have been added after that affair of Dyrrachium in which Caesar defeated. The vicinity of the armies made Cicero very anxious and reserved in what he wrote.

He did not appear any reason why Pompeius should be equally successful in any subsequent engagement. Laughter's comfort.

great hope. Our friend Brutus engages zealously in the cause. So far I have been able to write with caution. Farewell. Respecting the second payment, pray consider with all attention what is to be done; as I observed in the letter which I sent by Pollex.

LETTER V.

I CANNOT without the greatest pain describe to you what causes, how bitter, how grievous, how unexpected, have moved me, and compelled me to act from a certain impulse of mind, rather than from consideration. They were such as have produced the effect you perceive. I therefore neither know what to tell you about my concerns, nor what to ask of you. You see the result and sum of the business. I have understood from your letters, both from that which you wrote in conjunction with others, and from that which was in your own name, (what indeed I perceived by myself), that your declining influence made you look out for some new means of defending me. As to what you propose of my coming nearer, and travelling through the towns by night, I do not well see how that can be done; for I have not such convenient resting-places, that I can pass in them all the day-time; nor is it of much consequence for the purpose of your inquiry, whether people see me in the towns or on the road. But yet I will consider, among other things, how this can best be done. My uneasiness both of mind and body is beyond belief, and makes me incapable of writing many letters: I have only answered those which I received. I wish you would write to Basilus, and to whomsoever you think proper, also to Servilius, in my name. That I should have written nothing to you in so long an interval, you will understand to arise from want of matter to write upon, not from want of inclination. Respecting your inquiry about Vatinius, I should not want his services, nor anybody's else, if they could find how to assist me. Quintus was at Patre, in a disposition very hostile towards me. To the same place his son went from Corcyra. I imagine they are since gone from thence along with the rest.

LETTER VI.

I PERCEIVE your anxiety not only about your own, and the common calamities, but more particularly about me, and my affliction. And this my affliction is so far from being lessened, that it is even increased by associating yours with it. However, you see with your usual prudence to what source of consolation I am most open. For you approve of my determination, and declare that at such a time I could have done nothing better. You add also (what, though of less weight than your own judgment, yet has some weight with me) that the step which I have taken is approved by others also; that is, persons of consideration. If I thought this, I should be less afflicted. "Believe me," you say. I do believe you; but I know how desirous you are that my distress should be lightened. I have never regretted my withdrawing from the army: there was such a cruel spirit, such a co-operation with barbarous nations, that a proscription was contemplated not individually, but collectively; so that it was determined by common consent that the property of you all should be the prey of his victory; of you all, I say; for there was no thought even of you unmix'd with cruelty. I shall never repent of my good-will<sup>1</sup>; I do repent of the measures I adopted<sup>2</sup>. I could wish that I had retired to some remote town till I was sent for. I should have created less observation, and should have received less vexation. I should not be exposed to this present trouble<sup>3</sup>. To lie miserably at Brundisium, is every way painful. How can I advance nearer, as you advise, without the lictors, which the people gave me, and which can never be taken from me but by violence. These with their fasces I lately mingled for a time in the crowd, as I approached the town, through fear of some insult from the soldiers. I contrived to get home in time<sup>4</sup>. I want you now to go to Oppius; and, provided it be thought right to advance with these lictors, I imagine they will authorise me to consider of it<sup>5</sup>. For so they engage; that Cæsar will have regard not only to the preservation of my dignity, but even to the increase of it; and they exhort me to be of good courage, and to entertain the best hopes. They give me the strongest assurance of what I should more readily credit if I had remained at home. But I am entering upon things that are past. Consider then, I beg you, what remains, and consult about it with these people; and, (if you think it expedient, and it meets with their approbation,) that Cæsar may be the more inclined to approve what I do, let it appear to be at their suggestion. Let Trebonius, Pansa, and any others, be admitted to this consultation, and let them write to inform Cæsar that what I have done, has been at their suggestion. I am quite alarmed at Tullia's illness and debility. I understand you are very kind to her, for which I am greatly obliged to you. I never had any doubt about Pompeius's fate<sup>6</sup>. For all princes and people were so impressed with the desperate state of his affairs, that wherever he had gone, I supposed this would happen. I cannot help lamenting his fall: for I knew him to be a man of integrity, virtue, and dignity. Should I offer to console you about Fannius<sup>7</sup>? He talked mischievously about your remaining. And L. Lentulus had already promised himself Hortensius's house, and Cæsar's gardens, and Baiz. Just the same is done on this side, excepting that the other was boundless; for everybody who had staid in Italy was esteemed in the number of enemies. But some time or another I shall be glad to talk over these matters with my mind more at ease. I hear that my brother Quintus is gone into Asia to make his peace. Of his son I have heard nothing. Inquire of Diachares, Cæsar's freed-man, whom I have not seen, but who brought that letter from Alexandria. He is reported to have seen him either on his journey, or already in Asia. I look for your letter, as the occasion demands; and hope you will take care to let it be brought to me with all expedition. November 28.

LETTER VII.

I THANK you for your letter, in which you have accurately stated everything which you supposed to concern me. It is settled therefore, according to the opinion you give me from these people, that I should continue to be attended by the same lictors, as it was granted to Sestius: though I apprehend he did not retain his original lictors, but had others given him by Cæsar. For I understand that he disallows such decrees of the senate, as were passed subsequently to the departure of the tribunes. If therefore he chooses to be consistent with himself, he may still approve of my lictors. But what have I to do with lictors, who am almost ordered to quit Italy? For Antonius sent me the copy of a letter he had received from Cæsar, in which it was stated that he had heard of Cato's and L. Metellus's arrival in Italy, with the design of living openly in Rome; that he did not like this, from fear of its occasioning some disturbance; and that all should be excluded from Italy, except those whose case he should himself have heard: and he expressed himself on this subject with great warmth. Therefore Antonius wrote to me requesting that I would pardon him, but that he was not at liberty to disobey these instructions. Upon this I sent L. Lælius to explain to him that Cæsar had desired Dolabella to write to me, pressing me to come to Italy as soon as possible, and that I had come agreeably to his letter. He then issued an order to except me and Lælius by name; which I was sorry for, as he might have excepted us in fact, without publicly naming us. O the many heavy causes of uneasiness! which you kindly endeavour to alleviate, and not without effect; for you do indeed lessen my affliction by the very circumstance of your taking such pains to lessen it; and this I trust you will not think it burdensome to do very often. You will especially attain your purpose, if you can bring me to think that I have not entirely lost the good opinion of respectable people. Yet what can you do in this respect? Nothing, truly. But if circumstances should give you any opportunity, this will afford me the best consolation. It cannot be done at present; but if anything should arise in the course of events: like what has happened now. For it was said that I ought to have gone with Pompeius, but his fate lessens the re-

each of having neglected that duty. So of all things nothing is more censured, than that I should have gone into Africa: but I considered that the republic ought not to be defended by the barbarous troops of a faithless nation, especially against an army that had gained repeated victories. This perhaps will not be approved. For I hear that many good men are arrived in Africa; and I know there were many before. I am very much pressed on this subject. Here then I stand in need of some favourable chance. It may be that some, possibly all of them, may prefer their safety to the issue of war. For if they persevere, and gain their cause, you see in what a condition I shall be. I will say, what will be their condition if they are defeated? It will at least be a more honourable end. These considerations distract me. You do not say why you do not prefer Salpicius's destination to mine: for though it is less glorious than Cato's, it is however exempt both from danger and from remorse. The last thing to be considered, is the situation of those who are in Greece. However, these are so far better off, than I am, that we are together in considerable number; and whenever they come to Italy, they will come to their own home. Continue, as you do, to soften matters, and to conciliate as many as you can.

When you excuse yourself<sup>b</sup>, I am well aware of your reasons, and consider it for my interest you should be there<sup>c</sup>, if it be only to manage me, as you have hitherto done, what can be urged, with those in authority. In the first

I should be glad if you would attend to this: I apprehend there are many who have or will come to Cæsar, as either repenting of the step taken<sup>d</sup>, or disapproving what is done. And though both are true, yet these persons assert it of ill-will towards me, not that they have any ledge of its being so. But that Balbus and his may defend me against all such attacks, and his frequent letters may confirm Cæsar's kindness; that this may effectually be done, you see all diligence. Another reason why I should try to have you leave Rome is, that you say you have been entreated<sup>e</sup>—O sad business! What I write? or what should I desire? I shall be very short, for my tears burst forth. I commit you, and beg you to take it under your care. I see that, at such a time, it involve you in no folly. Pardon me, I beseech you: I can dwell longer on this subject for my tears and grief. I will say, that nothing can be more gratifying than your affection towards her. You do me in undertaking to write to whom you think proper. I have met with a person who saw the son at Samos, the father at Sicyon. My excuse is easily made. I wish they, who have seen Cæsar before me, may be as ready to be my interest with him, as I should be to be theirs, if I had any opportunity. When I come to take it in good part, if there should be anything in your letter that vexes me, I do it in the very best part; and request you to say everything without disguise, as you do; do it as often as possible. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

THOUGH you perceive indeed how greatly I am afflicted, yet you will know it from Lepta and Trebatius. I pay severely the penalty of my rashness<sup>a</sup>, which you would fain persuade me is prudence: nor do I prevent your disputing the point, and writing to me as often as possible. For your letters afford me some comfort at this time. You must use every exertion through those who wish well to me, and have influence with Cæsar, particularly through Balbus and Oppius, that they may write on my behalf with all diligence. For, as I hear, I am attacked both by some in person, and by letters. These must be met, as the importance of the occasion demands. Furnius<sup>b</sup> is there very unfriendly towards me; and Quintus has sent his son not only to make his own peace, but to accuse me. He gives out that I have traduced him to Cæsar; which is refuted by Cæsar himself and all his friends; and yet he does not cease, wherever he goes, to heap all sorts of reproaches upon me. Nothing ever happened to me so unaccountable, nothing in all these troubles so painful. Some atrocious things were related to me by those who had heard him talking openly at Sicyon in the hearing of many people. You know his manner; perhaps you have experienced it. It is all turned against me. But I add to my uneasiness by speaking of it, and make you uneasy too. Therefore I return to my subject, and beg you to let Balbus send somebody expressly for this purpose<sup>c</sup>. I should be glad if you would write in my name to whom you think fit. Farewell. December 27.

LETTER IX.

I HAVE indeed acted both incautiously, as you observe, and more hastily than I ought, and am out of all hope<sup>d</sup>, being kept by these exceptions<sup>e</sup> to the edicts. If they had not been made, through your care and kindness, I might be at liberty to go into some unfrequented place: now I cannot even do this. What advantage is it to have arrived before the tribunes enter upon their office<sup>f</sup>, if the coming at all is of no advantage? What can I hope from him<sup>g</sup>, who has never been a friend to me; since I am already undone and crushed by this law? Balbus's letters to me become daily less encouraging; and there may probably be many

<sup>g</sup> Furnius is probably mentioned, like Quintus, as one who used to be Cicero's friend, and whom it was therefore the more grievous to have against him on this occasion.

<sup>j</sup> See letter 7 of this book. He could not, without offending Cæsar, refuse to use his permission of remaining in Italy.

<sup>k</sup> Lest they might have published some law of exclusion. But he derived little benefit from his return to Italy, while he thought it unsafe to proceed through the country amidst Cæsar's adherents with his lictors, and unworthy of him to relinquish them.

from many quarters to Cæsar against me. I am ruined by own fault. No part of my troubles has been brought on by accident; everything is the effect of folly. For when I saw the nature of the contest; that all was unprepared, and feeble, against troops in the highest order; I separated<sup>a</sup> from them (what could I do?), and adopted counsels not so much bold, as allowable<sup>b</sup> for me beyond other men. I yielded to my friends, or rather I obeyed them. Of one of them, him whom you<sup>c</sup> commend to me, you will see the disposition from his own letters which he has sent to you and to others, and which I should never have opened but from the following circumstances. A parcel was brought to me, which I undid, to see if there was any letter for myself; which there was not. There was one to Vatinius, and another to Ligurius, which I ordered to be taken to them. They presently called upon me burning with grief, crying out upon the perfidy of the man. They read to me the letters, filled with all sorts of calumnies against me. Ligurius was quite in a rage, saying that he knew Cæsar had hated him; yet had not only shown him kindness, but had also given him so much money, out of regard to me. After receiving this shock, I was desirous of knowing what he had written to others; for I considered that it would be prejudicial to himself, if this great guilt of his should be generally known. I found they were all of the same kind. I have sent them to you, that if you think it desirable for him that they should be delivered, you may deliver them; no harm will accrue to me; for as to their being opened, I imagine Pomponia has his seal. It was his using this bitterness when we first set sail, which so affected me, that I was afterwards quite sunk: and now he is said to be solicitous not so much for himself as against me. Thus am I pressed by all circumstances; which I am hardly able, or rather quite unable, to bear<sup>d</sup>. Amongst these distresses there is one equivalent to all the rest, that I shall leave my poor daughter plundered of her patrimony, and all her fortune. I should therefore be particularly glad to see you, as you promise; for I have nobody else to whom I can commend her; as I understand her mother is threatened with the same dangers<sup>e</sup> as myself. But if you should not find me, yet let this be a sufficient commendation, and do you, as far as you can, mollify her uncle towards her. I write this on my birth-day; when I wish that I had never been born; or that my mother had produced nothing afterwards. I am prevented by tears from writing more.

<sup>a</sup> The word sciteram in this place evidently comes from scisco, and though I do not find any corresponding signification of it, I suspect it is here equivalent to deciveram, and have translated it accordingly.

<sup>b</sup> It would have argued more courage to join either of the contending parties; but Cicero was excusable in not joining Pompeius, by the hope of acting as a mediator of peace; and his obligations to Pompeius were such as forbade his co-operating with Cæsar.

<sup>c</sup> Quintus, in whose favour I suppose Atticus might have written to Cicero upon finding him angry at his brother's behaviour.

<sup>d</sup> Has not this expression, as well as what immediately follows, allusion to thoughts of destroying himself? such as we find him uttering under the affliction of his banishment in the third book.

LETTER X.

To my inconceivable distresses there has been a fresh addition from what has been related to me respecting the two Quintuses. P. Terentius, a friend of [mine, has had a good deal to do as deputy contractor for the customs and revenues in provincial Asia. He met with Quintus the son at Ephesus the 13th of December, and particularly invited him to his house through friendship to me. Having made inquiries from him about me, he said the young man informed him that he was very angry with me, and showed him a roll of paper containing a speech which he intended to make to Cæsar against me. Terentius said what he could to check his senseless conduct. Afterwards, at Patreæ, Quintus the father talked to him a great deal in a similar strain of slander. You are acquainted with his extravagance by the letters which I sent you. I am sure this must give you pain; to me it is most distressing, and the more so, because I imagine there will be no room for me even to expostulate with them. On the state of things in Africa, I hear accounts very different from what you mention. For they say nothing can be more steady, or better prepared; add to this, Spain<sup>a</sup>, and the disaffection in Italy, the declining strength and zeal of the legions, and the confusion in the city<sup>b</sup>. Where can I find any tranquillity<sup>c</sup>, but while I am reading your letters? which would no doubt be more frequent, if you had anything to offer by which you thought my cares could be lessened. But I beg you not to omit writing to me whatever happens; and those<sup>d</sup> who are so cruelly hostile to me, you may blame at least, if you cannot hate them; not with the expectation of doing any good; but to let them see that you love me. I will write more to you when you have answered my last letter. Farewell. January 21.

LETTER XI.

I AM so exhausted with the torment of my great distresses, that if there were anything upon which I ought to write to you, I should not easily be able to execute it; much less then, when I have nothing to tell you, when especially there is not even any prospect of things becoming better. So that I am no longer anxious even for your letters, though they always bring something agreeable with them. Therefore continue to write, whenever you have an opportunity of sending. I have nothing to reply to your last, which I received now a long time ago. For in this interval I find that everything is changed; the right cause has acquired strength, and I pay the heavy penalty of my folly<sup>e</sup>. I must procure for P. Sallustius thirty sestertia (240*l.*), which I received from Cn. Sallustius. I shall be

This is now almost gone. I wish therefore would arrange with her, that I may have it up here, if I only know that it will be sup-at Rome. But without knowing that, I have entured to do so. You see the state of all my

s. There is no sort of misfortune which I do ffer and apprehend. And the misery of this

LETTER XII.

HALIO delivered your letter to me the 8th ch in the evening; and the same day in the g I had despatched a messenger with a to you. Nevertheless, upon reading your I have thought it right to make some reply, lly as you express yourself doubtful what I shall make to Cæsar for my going away ime when I quitted Italy. I have no occa-r any new excuse: for I have repeatedly n by letter, and have sent word by several , that I was unable, if I wished it, to bear ctions that were made upon me; with many o the same effect. There was nothing that ished him to suppose, than that I had not pon my own judgment in a thing of such . Afterwards, upon hearing from Balbus as the younger, that he conceived my bro-intus to have been the trumpet to my for so he expressed himself, before I at Quintus had been writing to so many about me; though he had said, and done, vere things to me in person, yet I wrote tanding" to Cæsar in these words: "I am anxious for my brother Quintus, than for but in my present situation I cannot ven-omend him to you. So much however nture to ask of you, that I beg you will ose he has done anything to lessen my l affection towards you; but has always ntributed to unite us together; and has companion, not the adviser, of my going herefore in other matters you will attribute whatever your kindness and the friend-ven you demands. That I may be no to him in your esteem, I earnestly you again and again." If then I should meeting with Cæsar, though I do not t he will be kind towards him, as he has clared, yet I shall behave in the same s, I have always done. But, as I see, I h more reason to be concerned about hich you represent as being daily con-the hope of making terms, rather than of I wish this were so; but I understand much otherwise, and apprehend that you lf of that opinion, only write differently, view to deceive me, but to encourage ially when to Africa is joined Spain like-appears to be faulty. I have supposed, with it it ought to be nihilominus.

wise<sup>7</sup>. Respecting your recommendation of writing to Antonius and others; if you think it necessary, I should be glad if you would do this which you have often done before. For nothing occurs to me that I ought to write. If you hear that I am unreasonably broken in spirit, what think you, when you find these noble<sup>a</sup> actions of my son-in-law added to my former troubles? However, I hope you will not cease to write to me, as often as you can, although you should have nothing to write about. For your letters always bring me some comfort. I have formally accepted Galio's legacy.
I suppose it was a simple inheritance, since no form has been sent me. March 8.

LETTER XIII.

I HAVE hitherto received no letter by Muræna's freed-man. P. Siser brought that which I am now answering. What you mention about the letter of the elder Servius, and what you say of certain people having brought information of Quintus's arrival in Syria, are neither of them true. In reply to your inquiry, how those, who have come hither, are, or have been affected towards me, I have understood that nobody has manifested any disrespect. But how little this signifies to me, I am quite sure you can judge.
In my present grief everything is intolerable to me; and nothing more so, than that I find myself in a situation, where the only things that are apparently desirable<sup>a</sup>, are what I have always disapproved. P. Lentulus the father is said to be at Rhodes; the son at Alexandria; and C. Cassius, it appears, is gone from Rhodes to Alexandria.
Quintus offers me some explanation by letter, but in terms more bitter than his heaviest accusation.
For he says that he has understood from your letters, that you were displeased with his having written to several people so unkindly about me; and that he is sorry he should have given you any uneasiness, but that he had done what was right.
Then he details most foully the causes of his doing so. But neither at this time, nor before, would he have manifested his hatred towards me, unless he saw me to be every way distressed. I wish that even by travelling in the night, as you proposed,
I had approached nearer to you. I can now form no conjecture either when, or where, I am likely to see you. There was no occasion for your writing to me about the co-heirs of Fufidius: for what they ask is just in itself; and whatever you had done I should have been satisfied with it.
You have long since known my wish of redeeming the Frusinian estate<sup>b</sup>; though at that time my affairs were in a better condition, and I did not think my case so desperate; yet I have still the same wish. You will consider how this may be accomplished. And I should be glad, as far as you can, that you would secure me supplies for my necessary expenses. What means I had, I presented to Pompeius at a time when I thought I did it prudently. For which purpose I then both took it from your bailiff, and borrowed elsewhere; while Quintus complained by letter that I had given nothing to him; though he never asked me, nor have I beheld the money myself. But I wish you would see what there is, that can be done<sup>c</sup>, and what advice you can give me about everything; for you know the state of my affairs. My affliction prevents my writing more. If there is anything, which you think should be written to anybody in my name, I should be glad if you would do it as usual. Whenever you have an opportunity of sending a letter to me, I hope you will not omit it. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

I AM far from being offended with the honest truth conveyed in your letter; in which you do not even attempt to console me, as formerly, under the general, and particular calamities, which I suffer; but acknowledge that it can no longer be done. For things are not now, as they were before, when, to say nothing more, I thought I had companions and associates. But all who were supposed to be making their peace in Greece and in Asia, both those who knew the state of affairs<sup>d</sup>, and those who did not, are said to be going into Africa. So that, besides Lælius, I have no partner in my fault<sup>e</sup>; and even he is so far better off, as he has been received<sup>f</sup>. About myself however, I do not doubt but Cæsar has already written to Balbus and to Oppius; from whom I should have heard, if there had been anything good; and they would also have spoken with you. But I wish you would confer with them upon this subject, and let me know what answer they give you. Not that a grant of safety from Cæsar can have any assurance; but yet it will afford an opportunity of consideration and forecast. Though I dread the sight of everybody, especially with such a son-in-law<sup>g</sup>; yet in such great troubles I do not see what else<sup>h</sup> I should wish for. Quintus still goes on<sup>i</sup>, as both Pansa informs me and Hirtius. He<sup>k</sup> too is said to be on his way to Africa with the rest. I will write to Minucius the father, and will send your letter. I will let you know if he does anything<sup>l</sup>. I wonder that you should have been able to send thirty sestertia (240*l.*), unless it have arisen from the Fufidian estate. Yet I see it is so<sup>m</sup>. I

look for you; whom I should be particularly glad to see, if it can any how be managed; for the occasion demands it. The last act is already drawing to a conclusion<sup>n</sup>; when it is easy to judge more soundly what everything really is<sup>o</sup>. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

As you produce sufficient reason why I cannot see you at this time, pray what ought I to do? For Cæsar seems to hold Alexandria in such a manner<sup>p</sup> that he is ashamed even of writing about what is done there. But it looks as if the opposite party would soon pass over from Africa<sup>q</sup>; the Greeks<sup>r</sup>, also, will return from Asia to join them, or will remain in some neutral place. What, therefore, do you think I ought to do? I see that it is a difficult question: for I am alone, or with one other, and can neither return to that party nor derive any degree of hope from this. But I am desirous at least of knowing what you think; and this among other things made me wish to see you, if it could be done. I informed you before that Minucius had furnished me with only twelve sestertia (100*l.*); I should be glad if you could secure the payment of the rest. Quintus has written to me not only without asking pardon, but with great bitterness: the son with a degree of hatred which is surprising. No sort of evil can be imagined with which I am not assaulted. Yet everything is more tolerable than the sense of my own error, which is both strong and constant. If I were to have those companions in my error which I expected, yet it would be but a slender consolation. But every body's conduct besides admits of some excuse: mine admits of none. Some have been captured, some intercepted, so as not to call in question their attachment,—especially when, upon being at liberty, they have rejoined their party. Even those who voluntarily delivered themselves up to Fabius<sup>s</sup> can only be charged with timidity; and there are that money, which he would replace with Minucius's respondent at Rome.

<sup>n</sup> So I understand the original, which is concise and thence obscure. It may be worth while here to advert to the force of the present passive, expressive of that which is in the act of being done. The want of a corresponding tense in English has sometimes occasioned a misapprehension of the just meaning in both Greek and Latin authors; as Luke ix. 51, 'Εν τῇ συμληροῦσθαι τὰς ἡμέρας ἐκλήψης ἀβρόν'—When the days of his being received up into heaven were drawing towards their accomplishment—not, as in the common translation, "when the time was come."

<sup>o</sup> This seems to me to have been generally misunderstood; I conceive it to allude to the demouement of a stage play, like what is said afterwards in letter 19 of this book. "Jam enim mihi videtur adesse extremum."

<sup>p</sup> Cæsar, seduced by the charms of Cleopatra, was engaged in a war to support her cause in Egypt against her brother Ptolemæus.

<sup>q</sup> Egypt and Africa are generally distinguished by the Roman writers, the latter signifying that part which was reduced to a Roman province. Here, the party in Africa means the army attached to Pompeius's cause, who were in force in the neighbourhood of Carthage, from whence Cicero apprehended they might make an attack upon Italy.

You need less wonder, therefore, that I cannot support b a weight of affliction: for my error alone its of no reparation,—and perhaps Lælius's; how does that help me? They say that C. sus has<sup>c</sup> changed his intention of going to andria. These things I detail to you, not that can remove my trouble, but that I may know ther you have anything to offer about what v upon me. In addition to all the rest is my in-law, and these other matters, of which I ot write for weeping. I am vexed too about pus' son<sup>d</sup>. In short I am completely misercause I have now no companion in such a course. Those in Asia wait for the issue of events; the Greeks afford a hope of pardon to Fufius himself<sup>b</sup>. These people had at first the same fear as I, and adopted the same resolution; but the delay at Alexandria has righted their cause<sup>c</sup> and overset mine. Therefore I still request of you, as in my former letters, that if you see anything in my ruined condition which you think I ought to do, you will inform me. If I am received by Cæsar's party (which you see is not the case), yet as long as the war lasts I am uncertain what I should do or whither I should go. But if I am cast off, the difficulty is still greater. I look, therefore, for a letter from you, and beg you will write explicitly. With regard to your advice of writing to Quintus on the occasion of this letter,—I would do it if the letter gave me any satisfaction. Though somebody wrote to me lately in the following terms: "In these troubles I am not sorry to be at Patræ. I should be there with more satisfaction if your brother spoke of you in a way that I liked to hear." When you say that he complained of my not writing to him,—I once only received a letter from him, to which I sent an answer by Cephalo, who was detained several months by contrary weather. I have before mentioned to you that Quintus the son had written to me with great rudeness. The last thing I have to beg of you is, that if you think it right, and can undertake it, you would join with Camillus in speaking to Terentia about her will<sup>d</sup>. The times require that she should consider of it, and give satisfaction where it is due. I have understood from Philotimus that she is guilty of some great<sup>e</sup> misconduct, which I can scarcely believe. But at all events, if anything can be done, it must be looked to. I long to hear from you about everything, especially what you may say about her. Upon this I want your opinion, even if you have nothing to propose; for I shall consider that as conclusive. June 3.

LETTER XVII.

I SEND this by another person's messenger who is in a hurry to set off: for this reason it will be the shorter, and because I am going to send one of my own. My dear Tullia came to me the twelfth of June, and acquainted me with the numerous instances of your attention and kindness to her, and brought me three letters. But I not only <sup>b</sup> I understand this to mean that Fufius, who had been left in Greece, and to whom the Greeks had sued for pardon, now rested the hope of his own pardon from the reviving ascendancy of the Pompeians, upon the intercession of these very Greeks.

<sup>c</sup> By Cæsar's delay at Alexandria the Greeks had time to recover from their first alarm, and to observe the actual progress of affairs. Cicero, who had acted upon the presumption of Cæsar's superiority, now found himself in a difficult strait.

<sup>d</sup> Terentia's conduct and extravagance had now made Cicero resolve upon a divorce. And in such a case, where there were children, it was the custom for each party to make a settlement by will on their common offspring, proportioned to their several estates. For when a wife was not guilty of infidelity, her dowry was restored to her.

could not take that pleasure which I ought in the virtue, gentleness, and affection of an exemplary daughter, but was even touched with inconceivable grief at the thought of such a mind being involved in so sad a fortune,—and that by no fault of hers, but by my egregious folly. Now, therefore, I neither expect consolation from you, which I know you are anxious to administer, nor advice, for which there is no room. I perceive, indeed, both by your former letter and by the last, that you have tried everything. I think of sending Cicero<sup>1</sup> to Cæsar with Sallustius. I see no reason why I should detain Tullia here any longer in such a state of general affliction: I therefore mean to send her back to her mother as soon as she will let me. In return for your letter of consolation<sup>2</sup>, suppose me to have said what your own understanding suggests as proper for the occasion. What you mention of Oppius's conversation<sup>3</sup> is quite consonant with my suspicion; yet, speak as I might, I should never persuade these people that I approved of their conduct. However, I will observe what moderation I can; though I see not what it signifies to me if I should incur their displeasure. I find you have just cause to prevent your coming to me,—for which I am very sorry. Nobody brings any account of Cæsar's departure from Alexandria. It is certain that no person has come from thence since the 15th of March, nor has any letter been received from him since the 13th of December; by which you see that the affair of the letter<sup>4</sup> dated February 9 (which, even if it were genuine, would be of little account), is not true. I understand that L. Terentius is come from Africa, and has arrived at Pæstum. I should like to know what intelligence he brings, and how he got away, and what is doing in Africa. He is reported to have been despatched by Nasidius. If you find out how this is, I wish you would let me know. Respecting the ten sestertia (80*l.*), I will do as you direct. Farewell. June 14.

LETTER XVIII.

THERE is yet no rumour of Cæsar's departure from Alexandria; on the contrary, it is believed that he is fully occupied. I shall not, therefore, send my son, as I had intended; and must beg of you to extricate me from hence<sup>5</sup>: for any penalty is better than continuing here. Upon this subject I have written to Antonius, and to Balbus, and to Oppius. For whether there be war in Italy by land or by sea, it is by no means desirable for me to be here. Both of these may possibly happen; certainly one of them. I learned from your account

of Oppius's conversation what was their mind proceeding; but I beg you to make the most of it. I expect nothing whatever but what is usual; yet nothing can be worse than my present state. I wish you, therefore, to speak to Antonius and those others, and to expedite this business as you can. Write to me about everything as may be possible. Farewell. June 20.

LETTER XIX.

(Græc. xiv.)

I READILY assent to your letter, in which, say, in many words, that you have no other offer that can be of service to me. You assuredly no consolation that can relieve my suffering. For nothing has happened by which else it might be borne: but I have endured everything by those errors and distresses of mind and body, which I wish my anxieties<sup>1</sup> had chosen to heal rather than to aggravate. Since no hope is afforded me either of advice or of any consolation, I will not burden you with it. I trust, however, that you will cease to write,—but will let me know what occurs to your mind, whilst you have not sent or there is anybody to send to,—which will not be very long. There is a doubtful report<sup>2</sup> of his<sup>3</sup> having left Alexandria; which arose from the letter of Sulpicius, and has received confirmation from all the subsequent accounts. Whether true or false is of so little moment to me, that I know not which I should prefer. What I want to you some time since about the<sup>4</sup> will I could place among the adverse letters. I am distressed at the wretched means of this creature<sup>5</sup>; I think nothing ever happened like this, and wish you could point out to me any which I might assist her. I see the same difficulty which there was in giving advice before. The object disturbs me beyond everything. I was in the second payment of her fortune. I thought of somebody else,—but it is now past. I beg that these ruinous circumstances, if anything has raised and got together out of my plate, and part of my furniture, so as to be in security, you would pay attention to it. For things to be drawing to a conclusion without any prospect of peace; and the present state, even with an enemy, is incapable of subsisting. You may have an opportunity, if you think fit, of talking to Terentia upon these matters. I cannot write that I feel. Farewell. July 5th.

<sup>1</sup> This probably relates to Cæsar's lieutenants in Egypt, who acted, he says, as if they were determined to shut him shut up in Brundisium, being perhaps unwilling to determine anything about his lieutenants till they receive instructions from Cæsar. He applies to Atticus to procure authority for his removal without compromising his dignity.

<sup>3</sup> Said in a sort of despair of his being able to support his troubles. See letter 9 of this book, note f.

<sup>4</sup> See letter 16 of this book. The subsequent line is a very doubtful interpretation. It may perhaps allude to some expression of Atticus, or his friends, calling the letter of Cicero in which he spoke of his will, as one of his croaking letters.

<sup>5</sup> His daughter Tullia; for in the very next, and several other letters, he speaks of her in similar terms.

LETTER XX.

(Græc. xxiii.)

ATTICUS has informed me that you had spoken on the subject, about which I wrote<sup>a</sup> to beg would communicate with him. I am now expecting to hear from you; though if it is otherwise I ought to be, I do not see how it can be: but having received a letter from him<sup>b</sup>, I am one from you also; and conclude that you too have learned all you wished,—provided only you are well; for you mentioned your being troubled with some kind of indisposition. One day I arrived from Rhodes the 24th of June, I caught word that Quintus the son had set out on the 29th of May; and that Philotimus arrived at Rhodes the day before with a letter for me. You will hear Acusius himself,—he travels slowly; in consequence of which I deliver my letter to a more expeditious messenger. What may be in Cæsar's letter I know not, but my brother Quintus highly congratulates me. To say the truth, so great has been my error, I can obtain nothing, even in imagination, that can be tolerable to me. I entreat you to write about this poor creature<sup>c</sup>, and (what I lately mentioned to you) that something may be made up to cure her from want, and likewise about this I wish also that I had attended before to her business<sup>d</sup>, but I was afraid of everything. It was nothing better in this deplorable situation than a separation. I should then have done something, like one alive<sup>e</sup>,—whether the cause were the law for expunging debts, or the injuries, or his commerce with Metella, together<sup>f</sup>. Her property would not then have been lost, and I should have appeared to feel no indignation. I well remember your saying<sup>g</sup> but I remember also that time: though it was preferable. Now he seems himself to have eaten it<sup>h</sup>; for I hear such things respecting the state of the republic<sup>i</sup>; O gods! My son-in-law especially! That he should do this; even for all former debts! I think with you, that a bill of divorce should be sent. He may demand the third instalment of her property. Consider, therefore, whether I should let it originate with himself, or whether I anticipate him. If it be any how possible, travelling at night, I will try to see you. You will write to me upon these matters, anything else which it may concern me to do. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

(Græc. xix.)

HAVING an opportunity of writing by your servant, I would not let it slip, though I have nothing to say. You write to me less frequently than you used, and shorter,—which I impute to your having nothing that you think I can like to read or to hear. But if there is anything, of whatever kind it may be, I should wish you to let me know it. The only thing that would be desirable for me is, if anything can be done respecting a peace,—of which in truth I entertain no hope. Yet since you sometimes slightly mention it, you compel me to hope for what is hardly within the compass of my wishes. Philotimus is expected the middle of August: I know nothing more about him. I shall be glad to receive your answer to what I mentioned to you in a former letter<sup>b</sup>. I have yet time enough in the midst of calamities to use some precaution, though I have hitherto never used any. Farewell. July 22.

LETTER XXII.

(Græc. xxiv.)

WHAT you some time since mentioned to me, and what you have twice repeated in your letters to Tullia about me, I perceive to be true. And I am the more miserable (though my wretchedness appeared to admit of no addition) because I not only must not resent the great injury I have received<sup>c</sup>; but cannot even lament it with impunity. Therefore I must try to bear it. But when I have borne it, yet all the calamities are to be sustained, which you caution me to prevent<sup>d</sup>. For such is the offence I have committed, that in every state of affairs, and under every party, it is likely to be attended with the same consequence<sup>e</sup>. But I shall proceed in my own hand<sup>f</sup>, since what follows demands secrecy. See, I beseech you, even now about the will. The idea of its having been made at the time when she began to inquire, did not I imagine strike you (else she would not have asked), neither did it strike me. Yet, as if it were so, having once entered upon the subject, you may advise her to entrust it to somebody, whose fortune is exempt from the hazard of this war. I should like, above all, that it might be to you, if she is of the same mind. I conceal from the poor creature that in this I am apprehensive of that other danger<sup>g</sup>. I am well aware that nothing can be sold now; but things may be laid by and secreted, so as to escape that ruin which hangs <sup>b</sup> This probably alludes to Cicero's speaking too freely upon the state of affairs; which is mentioned more distinctly in the latter part of this letter, and was before noticed in letter 17 of this book.

<sup>g</sup> The confiscation of his property, in apprehension of which he wished to have Terentia's settled by will, and over us. For when you say that my own property will be ready for my use, and yours for Terentia; yours I grant; but what can there be of mine? Respecting Terentia however (to pass by all other grievances, which are innumerable), what can be worse than this? You had written to her to send a bill of exchange for twelve sestertia (100*l.*), this being what remained out of the silver. She sent me ten sestertia (80*l.*), and added that this was all which remained. You see what a person would do in a large concern, who could purloin this little from a small one. Philotimus has not only not arrived, but has not even acquainted me by letter, or by message, what he is doing. Some, who are come from Ephesus, relate that they saw him there going to law about some disputes of his own, which it is probable may be put off till Cæsar's arrival. So that I imagine he either has nothing which he thinks it of importance to deliver quickly to me (in which case I am the more neglected); or, if he has anything, he does not trouble himself to convey it to me till all his own business is finished. All this gives me great uneasiness; yet not so much, as perhaps it ought; for I apprehend nothing signifies less to me, than what is brought from thence<sup>a</sup>. Why I think so<sup>1</sup>, I am persuaded you know. When you caution me about accommodating my countenance and language to the time; difficult as this is, I would however command myself, if I thought it at all signified to me. When you say in your letter that you think the business of Africa may be settled<sup>2</sup>, I wish you had added why you think so. No reason occurs to me to suppose that it can be done; but if there should be anything, which has a ray of consolation, I hope you will write to acquaint me with it: or if, as I perceive, there should be nothing, write to tell me even this. If I should soon hear anything, I will write to you. Farewell. August 6th.

LETTER XXIII.

(Græc. xx.)

On the 16th of August arrived C. Trebonius from Seleucea Pieria, after a voyage of twenty-seven days. He reported that he had seen Quintus, the son, and Hirtius, with Cæsar, at Antioch; and that they had obtained all that they asked on behalf of Quintus without any difficulty. At which I should the more rejoice, if this concession afforded me any assurance of hope. But there are other things to be feared, and from other quarters; and what is granted by Cæsar, as by a master, is still under his control. He has also pardoned Sallustius<sup>3</sup>; and indeed is said to refuse nobody. Which itself is suspicious that inquiry may only be deferred. M. son to Quintus Gallius, has restored Sallustius' slaves. He came to transport the legions into Sicily; and brings word that Cæsar is preplaced in the hands of some trustee, who would not be exposed to the same ruin.

sently going thither from Patre. If he does, I<sup>1</sup> shall go to some place nearer Rome, as I wish I had done before. I am longing to receive your answer to the letter in which I lately requested your advice. Farewell. August 17.

LETTER XXIV.

(Græc. xxi.)

On the 27th of August I received your letter, dated the 21st; and the pain arising from Quintus' former misconduct, which I had now laid aside, I felt most severely upon reading his letter. Though you could not any how avoid sending me the letter, yet I would rather it had not been sent. In answer to what you say about the will, you must judge what can be done, and how. About the money, she<sup>2</sup> wrote as I informed you before. If there is occasion, I must draw from the resource you mention. It is not probable that Cæsar will reach Athens by the 1st of September. Many things are said to detain him in Asia, especially Pharnaces<sup>3</sup>. The 12th legion, to which Sulla came in the first instance, is reported to have driven him away by stones<sup>4</sup>. They do not suppose that any of them will stir. It is expected that Cæsar will proceed directly from Patre to Sicily: but if this<sup>5</sup> be true, he will be under the necessity of coming hither. And I wish he had come before: for I should then have got away somewhere or other. Now I am afraid of being obliged to wait, and among other things to bear in misery the unhealthiness of this place. What you advise of my taking care to act suitably to the time, I would do, if circumstances permitted, and if it were any how possible. But amidst such great offences on my part, and such great injuries on the part of my relations<sup>6</sup>, I can neither do anything with becoming dignity, nor wear the appearance of it. You compare the times of Sulla: when everything was conducted splendidly in its kind, though a little intemperately in the manner. But I lay aside<sup>7</sup> all considerations of this sort; and much rather prefer what may be advantageous to the community, with whose interest I have united my own. I should hope however that you will write to me as often as you can, particularly as nobody else writes: but if everybody <sup>1</sup> It may seem at first contradictory, that Cicero should here speak of removing from Brundisium, when in the preceding letter he regrets his inability to do so. But probably his stay at Brundisium may have been thought proper, in order to salute Cæsar on his arrival; and this reason would cease when Cæsar should pass into Sicily and Africa without touching in Italy.

<sup>4</sup> They refused to go into Africa till they should have received their pay. See letter 25 of this book.

<sup>6</sup> Alluding to Terentia, to Quintus, and to Dolabella, whose behaviour had very much vexed and mortified his too irritable mind.

<sup>7</sup> Atticus had probably recommended the necessity of temporising, as in the times of Sulla; to which I understand Cicero to reply, that the cases are not similar; and that at all events his own views were directed to the public good, not to his private security. Literally thus:—But these things are of such a kind as I must forget."

vote, yet I should be very anxious for your letters. You say that Cæsar will be more disposed to forgive Quintus at my intercession; but I before wrote a word, that he at once granted to Quintus the everything he desired, without any mention of me. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.

(Græc. xxii.)

JALBUS's messenger delivered the packet<sup>1</sup> to me very carefully. For<sup>2</sup> you write as if you were afraid I may not have received those letters, which indeed had never been delivered to me: for I increased my affliction: and into whose hands they had fallen, they would have communicated nothing new. For what is so universally known, as his animosity against me, and this style is letters? Which I imagine Cæsar transmits to these persons, not because he was offended at Quintus's baseness, but for the sake of making misfortunes more public. For when you say you are afraid they may injure him<sup>3</sup>, and that are endeavouring to remedy this, Cæsar did even wait to be asked about him<sup>4</sup>. This I am sorry for: I am more sorry that my own requests should have no effect. Sulla, as I conjecture, will be here to-morrow with Messala. They are hastening to Cæsar after being driven away by the soldiers, who refuse to go anywhere till they have received their pay. He<sup>5</sup> will therefore come hither, which was not expected. But it will be some time first; for he travels so as to spend several days in the principal towns. And, do what he will, Pharnaces will occasion some delay. What therefore do you think I ought to do? For my health already supports with difficulty the effect of this unwholesome air, which occasions additional uneasiness in my distress. Shall I beg these people<sup>6</sup>, who are going to him, to make my excuses? And shall I proceed nearer to Rome? Pray consider this; and, what in spite of my repeated entreaties you have not hitherto done, assist me with your advice. I know it is a thing of difficulty; yet do it as may be in these troubles. It is besides of great consequence to me to see you: I shall have gained something, if that happens. You will attend to the business of the will, as you mention.

[A few days after Cicero had sent this last letter, Cæsar unexpectedly arrived in Italy. He landed at Tarentum in September, and on the first notice of his setting forwards towards Rome, Cicero set out on foot to meet him. Cæsar no sooner saw him, than he alighted and, ran to embrace him; then walked with him alone, conversing familiarly with him for some time. Cicero followed Cæsar to Rome. At the end of the year Cæsar embarked for Africa, to pursue the war against Scipio and the other Pompeian generals.]

BOOK XII.

LETTER I.

It is now the eleventh day since we parted, and I will these few lines, on the point of going home before dawn. I design to get to-day to Ariminum, to-morrow to Tusculanum, and to be there one day; so that on the 28th I shall be at our appointment. And I wish I may be able to run immediately afterwards to the embrace of dear Tullia, and to get a kiss of Attica<sup>a</sup>, write to me all about her<sup>b</sup>; that while I stay at Tusculanum, I may know what she prattles; or, if I am in the country, what she writes to you. In the meantime either send her, or give her, my love and likewise to Pilia; and though we shall not meet, yet write to me if you have anything to say. When I was folding up this letter, the messenger, who had travelled all night, came to me with

Upon reading which, I have been much vexed at Attica's indisposition. I have told you from your letter everything else, which I have said. But as to what you say of the fire in Ariminum<sup>c</sup>, it is a greater sign of age to waver Attica's daughter.

It is reasonable to suppose this may refer to some ex-cess of Atticus joking with Cicero for wanting a fire in Ariminum, like an old man; to which Cicero replies, in memory. For I had fixed the 29th with Axius, the 30th with you, and the day of my arrival with Quintus, that is the 28th. This is all I have to say to you: there is nothing new. What need of writing then? What? When we are together, and prattle about anything that comes into our heads, the very talking, even if it is about nothing, has a sweetness in the conversation itself.

LETTER II.

HERE, however<sup>d</sup>, it is rumoured that Marcus has perished by shipwreck; that Asinius has been delivered up alive into the hands of the soldiers<sup>e</sup>; that fifty ships have been carried into Utica by this adverse wind; that Pompeius<sup>f</sup> is not to be found, nor has he been in the Balearic islands<sup>g</sup>, as that it is a greater sign of age to lose one's memory, as Atticus appears to have done in making some mistake respecting the arrangement of the days after Cicero should have returned to Rome.

<sup>d</sup> It is to be presumed that this refers to a previous letter received from Atticus, in which he might have said there was no news.

Patienus affirms. But there is no authority for anything. I send you what has been talked of in your absence. In the meantime games are to be celebrated at Præneste: there will be Hirtius, and all that party<sup>b</sup>; and the games are to last eight days. What feasting! What gaiety! While this is going on, the business<sup>c</sup> has perhaps been settled. O marvellous men!! But Balbus is building: for what cares he? Yet, if you consider, for one who studies not what is right, but what is agreeable<sup>d</sup>, has he not done well? "And are you asleep all this while? It is time you should explain your purpose, if you mean to do anything!" If you ask what I think, I think the proper purpose of life is, to be useful<sup>e</sup>. But why should I say much? I shall presently see you; and, as I hope, from the road straight to me; when we will together appoint a day for Tyrannio<sup>f</sup>, and arrange anything else that is to be done.

LETTER III.

EXCEPTING yourself, I believe nobody is less of a flatterer than I am; or if we are either of us occasionally so towards anybody, at least it is never towards each other. Listen to me, then, when I say this without any deceit: that I wish I may die, my Atticus, if not only my Tusculanum (where I am otherwise very happy), but the islands of the blessed spirits<sup>g</sup> are so precious in my sight, that I could be content always to be there without you. Therefore, to attribute to you the same feeling (which, indeed, is the case), let these three days<sup>h</sup> of which you speak be endured patiently; but I should be glad to know whether you come to-day immediately from the auction, or on what day. In the mean time, I occupy myself with my books, and am sorry that I have not got Vennonius's history. However, not to be silent about my affairs, there are three ways of recovering that debt which is granted<sup>i</sup> me by Cæsar; either by purchasing at

<sup>i</sup> Called also the Fortunate Islands, into which the spirits of good men were supposed to pass after death. They are believed to be the same as the Canaries. These were formerly only casually and imperfectly known, and had ascribed to them beauties which they never really possessed.

<sup>j</sup> Hoc triduum probably refers to Atticus's own expression in some former letter, putting off his visit to Cicero for three days. It may be observed that Cicero was a very early riser, often writing his letters before it was light; he may very well, therefore, have sent to Atticus at Rome, only about twelve miles distant, to know if he might expect him that day.

<sup>k</sup> It having been seen that at the approach of the war Cicero was indebted to Cæsar, it is not probable that he could subsequently have become his creditor. I am in-the sale (I would rather lose it: though independent of its baseness, I imagine this would itself be to lose it); or by assignment from a broker at a year's credit (who is there, that I could trust? Or when would that Metonic<sup>l</sup> year arrive?); or by Vectenus's agreement for one<sup>m</sup> half. Think about it. I am afraid, after all, that this man may make no sale; but that he may hasten to add his applause to the conclusion of the games, lest a person of such importance<sup>n</sup> should be disregarded. But it<sup>o</sup> shall be attended to.

LETTER IV.

YOUR letter was most acceptable and delightful to me. How say you? I have recovered my holiday<sup>p</sup>. For I was troubled at Tiro's account of your having appeared to him to be flushed. I shall add, therefore, one day more, as you propose. Respecting Cato, it is a problem fit for Archimedes<sup>q</sup>. It is impossible for me to write what your companions<sup>r</sup> will read, not merely with satisfaction, but even with patience. For even if I should refrain from mentioning the opinions he has delivered, and all that zeal and wisdom which he showed on behalf of the republic; if I should only attempt to commend his dignity and firmness; this itself may be worth hearing; but such a man cannot justly be praised, unless it is set forth that this state of things<sup>s</sup> which is now established he saw while it was yet future, and strove to prevent; and that he might not see it accomplished, relinquished his life. Of these things what is there that I can render palatable to Aledius<sup>t</sup>? But pray take care of your health, and that prudence, which you show in everything, show especially in your own recovery.

LETTER V.

"QUINTUS the father for the fourth time<sup>u</sup>," or rather for the thousandth time, shows his want of sense in taking pleasure at his son and Statius being inclined to think, therefore, that this debt to Cicero may have been due from one of Pompeius's party, whose goods were confiscated, but out of which Cæsar may have permitted Cicero to indemnify himself. See letter 21 of this book, note <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>v</sup> Alluding to the cycle of 19 years invented by Meto, in which time it was calculated (but not correctly) that the sun and moon would return to the same positions about the earth.

<sup>w</sup> Being content to receive one-half of the debt, as it is probable Vectenus might have done on some similar occasion.

<sup>x</sup> Said ironically, importing that this partition of Cæsar's, whoever he was, might be glad to push himself into notice by his applause, and escape the discharge of his debt.

de Luperians<sup>a</sup>, to see his family loaded with this disgrace. I may add also Philotimus as a d. What singular folly; if my own<sup>b</sup> were not greater. But what face can he have to ask to defray his expenses for this purpose? Suppose him to have come to no "dry spring," but to me<sup>c</sup> itself; or, as you say, to drink in your stain "the emerging flood of Alpheus<sup>d</sup>;" especially under his great embarrassments. Where can end? But it is his affair. I am much pleased by my "Cato:" but so was Bassus Lucilius<sup>e</sup> with performances. About Cælius<sup>f</sup> you will inquire, on mention; I am quite ignorant. epitome of Brutus, or rather Brutus's epitome of Fannius's history. I wrote what I found in the latter part of that work; in following which I called this Fannius, who wrote the history, son-in-law to Lælius: but you demonstratively refuted it. Now Brutus and Fannius refute you. I had understood from Hortensius, who is good authority, that it was as Brutus states. Disentangle, therefore, this matter. I have sent Tiro to meet Dolabella. He will return to me the thirteenth; and I shall hope to see you the next day. I perceive the great interest you take in my dear Tullia; and that this may always be the case I earnestly entreat you. So, then, all is still open to consideration<sup>h</sup>; for so you write word. Though I wished to avoid the beginning of the month<sup>i</sup>, and to escape the ledger of the Nicasios<sup>j</sup>, and I have my own accounts to make up; yet nothing is of sufficient moment to make me absent myself from you; being actually at Rome, and hoping very soon to see you; though every day the hours seem long whilst I am expecting you. You know that I am no flatterer, and say, therefore, something less than I feel.

LETTER VI.

WITH respect to Cælius, pray take care that there is no defect in the gold. I know the way of these things<sup>k</sup>. But the loss from the exchange is quite enough; and if to this is added the gold itself—But what am I saying? You will see after it. Here you have something in Hegesius's style<sup>l</sup>, which Varro commends. I come now to Tyrannio<sup>m</sup>. What say you? Is this true? and without me? How often have I, when I was at leisure, yet refrained from reading it without you? How, therefore, can you excuse this? There is but one way; by sending me the book, which I particularly beg you to do; though the book itself will not delight me more than I have been delighted with your admiration of it. For I love everybody that shows his attachment to his countrymen<sup>n</sup>; and am pleased with your great admiration of so subtle a speculation. Though indeed your observations are all of that kind<sup>o</sup>; for you are fond of that science by which alone the understanding is nourished. But pray, what is there in that acute and deep research, which has reference to the ultimate principle<sup>p</sup> of

<sup>i</sup> This is supposed to be owing to his unwillingness to appear in the senate convened by order of Cæsar on the first of August.

<sup>j</sup> The meaning of this is uncertain, but most probably relates to the payment of interest to some usurers of this name, if he should be obliged to borrow money.

<sup>k</sup> I understand this to mean, I know how liable gold is to be adulterated.

morals? However, this is a long inquiry; and you are engaged, perhaps, in some business of mine; and instead of that dry basking<sup>1</sup> which you overdid on my lawn, I shall expect to be entertained with ointments and elegances. But, to go back to my former subject: if you love me, send the book; for it is truly yours since it has been sent to you. "Have you so much leisure from your affairs, Chremes," that you can read also my "Orator!" Well done! I am much obliged; and shall be still more so, if not only in your own copy, but in those for other people, you will get your librarians to insert Aristophanes in the place of Eupolis<sup>2</sup>. Cæsar, I imagine, meant to rally you upon using the word quæso, which, however, is quaint and pleasing. At the same time he so insists upon your being under no anxiety, that I can have no doubt of his intention<sup>3</sup>. I am sorry that Attica's indisposition<sup>4</sup> should continue so long; but as she has now no shivering, I hope all is going on as we could wish.

LETTER VII.

I HAVE made a short note of everything that you desire, and have delivered it to Eros; indeed, more than you ask; and amongst other things what relates to my son, the first notice of whose wish I received from you. I talked freely with him: and, if it is convenient to you, should be glad if you would inquire about it from himself. But why should I delay to inform you? I explained to him that by my desire you had applied to him to know whether there was anything that he wished or wanted; and that you had acquainted me with his wish of going to Spain<sup>5</sup>, and his want of a liberal allowance. With respect to his allowance, I told him I would do as much as Publius, or the flamen Lentulus, had done for their sons. Respecting Spain, I mentioned two objections; one, the same that occurred to you, that I was fearful of incurring reproach. Was it not enough to have relinquished our arms in support of the Pompeian party? Must we also take arms against it? The other objection was, that he would be mortified by seeing his cousin admitted to greater familiarity and favour. I would rather he should enjoy my liberality than his own liberty. Yet I gave my consent: for I understood that you did not greatly object to it. I must think about it again and again, and I beg you to do the same. It is a great thing, and one that involves no difficulty to remain quiet: the other is very doubtful. But we will consider of <sup>1</sup> This probably alludes to some conversation on the foundation of moral duty, held at Cicero's house during the time of their basking in the sun, as was usual among the ancient Romans. The word abusus et seems to imply that Atticus had carried this to a prejudicial extent: the ointments and elegances mentioned are intended to designate Atticus's politeness compared with Cicero's drier statement; ointments being often used previous to basking.

it. About Balbus I had made a memorandum, and think of doing so, as you advise, as soon as he comes back. But if his coming is delayed, I shall at all events wait three days. I omitted to mention also that Dolabella is with me.

LETTER VIII.

MANY persons approve of this measure respecting Cicero<sup>1</sup>. He<sup>2</sup> is a very proper companion. But we must previously see about this first payment<sup>3</sup>, for the day approaches, and he<sup>4</sup> travels quickly. Pray write to inform me what news Celer brings of Cæsar's transactions with the candidates; whether he intends to go himself into the Campus Fœnicularius<sup>5</sup>, or into the Campus Martius. And I should like to know whether it is necessary to be at Rome at the comitia; for I must needs satisfy both Filia<sup>6</sup>, and especially Attica.

LETTER IX.

(Græv. x.)

THIS is sad indeed about Athamas<sup>1</sup>. Your concern is natural, but ought to be moderated. There are many ways of consolation; of which the properest is, to let reason do that which time will do. But let us take care of Alexis<sup>2</sup>, that counter-part of Tiro, whom I have sent back sick to Rome; and if there is any epidemical sickness on the Quirinal hill<sup>3</sup>, let us transfer him with Tiamæus<sup>4</sup> to my house. All the upper part of the house is unoccupied, as you know. I think this is worth considering.

LETTER X.

(Græv. xi.)

I AM sorry for poor Sejus: but whatever happens in the course of nature must be borne with patience. For indeed what are we? Or how long are we likely to regard these things? Let us consider

<sup>5</sup> This may perhaps mean, whether Cæsar will appoint the magistrates "in a field of fennel," that is, in Spain, or suffer them to be regularly elected in the "field of Mars," or Campus Martius at Rome; for both Plinius and Dioscorides take notice of fennel (μαρσάρον, feniculus) being particularly cultivated in Spain; and Strabo mentions a place in Spain called "the fennel plain," from this circumstance.

<sup>6</sup> Celer, who was a candidate probably for the prætorship, is supposed to have been a relation of Filia's, perhaps her brother, whom Cicero would not fail to support if there should be a free election. For Attica he often playfully professes his affection.

it more nearly concerns ourselves, (yet not ch either), what I should do about the senate. I omit anything, Cæsonius has written to me say that Posthumia, Sulpicius's wife, is come to house. I have already told you that I have no oughts at present of Pompeius Magnus's daughter. The other whom you mention, I believe know. I never saw anything more disgusting. I shall presently see you: therefore when we t. After I had sealed my letter, I received ra. I hear with pleasure of Attica's cheerfulness, yet partake of your anxiety.

LETTER XI.

(Græv. ix.)

ASSURE you I am very well pleased with being, and that, more and more every day, but for reason which I mentioned in a former letter. It can be pleasanter than this retreat, if it not a little interrupted by the son of Amyntas. What a tiresome loquacity! In other acts, you can imagine nothing more delightful the house, the coast, the view of the sea, and, sort, the whole together. But even this does require a long letter, and I have nothing particular to tell you, and am very sleepy.

LETTER XII.

Therefore, whether you have anything to say or nothing, yet write something; and take care of yourself.

LETTER XIII.

I AM not easy about Attica, though I rely upon Craterus's<sup>1</sup> opinion. Brutus's letter is sensible and friendly<sup>2</sup>, but made me shed many tears. This retreat<sup>3</sup> is less worrying to me than that course of people. I want nobody but you. However, I occupy myself in study with the same ease as if I was at home<sup>4</sup>. Yet the same violence of grief presses and hangs upon me; not that I indulge it, but still I do not resist it. Respecting what you mention of Appuleius<sup>5</sup>, I apprehend there is no occasion for any exertion on your part, or on that of Balbus and Oppius, to whom he pledged himself, and desired I might be informed that he would not give me any trouble. Nevertheless, get me excused from day to day on account of my health. Lænas had promised to do this. Engage<sup>6</sup> C. Septimius and L. Statilius. In short, nobody that you ask will refuse to swear. But if there is any difficulty, I will go up myself, and will swear to a continual sickness. For as I must absent myself from these meetings, I would rather it should appear to be done by law than by grief. I should be glad if you would call upon Cocceius; for he does not perform what he promised. I wish to buy some place to hide and shelter my affliction.

<sup>2</sup> Cicero has been shown before to be at this time engaged in his book "De Finibus," in which he discusses in a dialogue the opinions of different philosophers respecting the constitution of moral virtue, and seems to have consulted Atticus upon the person whom he should introduce to support Epicurus's doctrine.

<sup>3</sup> By "this latter kind" I conceive to be meant not "more recent," but on the contrary, those who had been some time dead, but whom he had eventually named last among different descriptions of persons.

<sup>9</sup> This Appuleius appears to have been lately incorporated into the college of augurs, on which occasion several festivals were held, from which Cicero desired to be excused.

<sup>10</sup> It seems to have been necessary for three of the college to attest the incapacity of one from attending; he therefore desires Atticus to apply to C. Septimius and L. Statilius, in addition to Lænas. See letter 14 of this book.

LETTER XIV.

I WROTE to you yesterday about excusing me to Appuleius. I imagine there is no difficulty. Whomsoever you call upon, nobody will refuse. But speak to Septimius, and Lænas, and Statilius; for there must be three. Lænas promised me to manage the whole. As to what you mention of being called upon by Junius<sup>a</sup>; assuredly Cornificius is a rich man: however, I should like to know when it is that I am said to have been bound; and whether for the father or for the son. Nevertheless, as you say, see Cornificius's agents, and the surveyor<sup>b</sup> Appuleius. In wishing me to be restored from my affliction, you act as you always do; but you are witness that I have not been wanting to myself. For there is nothing written by anybody on the lessening of affliction, which I have not read at your house. But my grief overcomes all consolation. I have even done what nobody ever did before me, written for my own consolation. I will send the book to you, if the clerks have transcribed it. I assure you, no comfort is equal to it. I write all day long; not that I expect any good from it, but for the time I am pre-occupied; not effectually indeed, for the violence of my grief presses me; but yet I am soothed; and I strive by all means to compose not my mind only, but, if possible, my very countenance. In doing which I sometimes think I am doing wrong, sometimes I think I should do wrong if I omitted it. There is some relief in retirement: but it would be much better if you were here. This is the only reason of my removal. For, in regard to my distress, it suits well. Yet this also is a source of regret; that you can no longer entertain the same regard for me; those qualifications in which you used to take pleasure are gone. I wrote to you before about Brutus's letter to me. It was sensibly written, but afforded me no comfort. What he wrote to you of his coming hither; that I should like; for such appears to be his affection that it could not fail of doing me some good. If you have any intelligence, I hope you will write to me, especially to inform me when Pansa<sup>c</sup> sets out. I am concerned about Attica, yet I rely upon Craterus. Do not let Pilia despond. Your own accustomed anxiety is enough for everybody.

LETTER XV.

As it is not thought right to make a general excuse to Appuleius, you will take care that it is renewed from day to day. In this solitude I have no intercourse with anybody; but penetrate in the morning into a thick rough wood, from whence I do not go out before evening. Next to you, nothing is more pleasing to me than solitude. There all my conversation is with books. Even this is interrupted by tears, which I resist as much as I can; but hitherto I am unequal to it. I will write an answer to Brutus, as you advise. You shall have the letter to-morrow, and will forward it when you have an opportunity.

LETTER XVI.

I WOULD not have you neglect your own concerns to come to me. I will rather go to some place nearer, if you should be prevented much longer. Though, indeed, I should not have removed out of your sight, unless I had found that nothing was of any use to me; yet if there was any alleviation, it was only in you; and as soon as there can be from anything, it will be from you. Now, however, I cannot bear the very circumstances of being without you: but I do not approve of staying in your house; nor can I stay in my own; nor if I were anywhere near, should I still be with you; for the same cause would prevent your being with me, which prevents you now. As yet nothing has been more agreeable to me than this solitude, which I wish Philippos may not destroy<sup>d</sup>, for he arrived yesterday evening. Writing and study do not assuage my grief, but they interrupt it.

LETTER XVII.

MARCIANUS has informed me that my excuse has been made to Appuleius by Laterensis, Naso, Lænas, Torquatus, and Strabo. I should be glad if you would get letters written to them expressive of my thankfulness. As to what Flavius says of my having been surety for Cornificius more than five-and-twenty years ago, though the defaulter is rich, and Appuleius is a liberal appraiser, yet I should be glad if you would find out from the books of the joint securities, whether it is really so. For previously to my being sedile I had no intercourse with Cornificius. I do not, however, mean to deny it; but I should like to know the truth. You may also call upon the agents, if you think proper. Though what does it signify to me? Nevertheless—You will inform me of Pansa's departure when you know it. Give my love to Attica, and pray take good care of her. My respects to Pilia.

LETTER XVIII.

WHILST I avoid all recollections which by a certain sting exasperate my pain, I refrain from advising with you; but trust you will excuse me in this matter, whether I am doing right or wrong. For some of those authors, which I now chiefly read, say, that it is a duty to do what I have frequently mentioned to you, and what I would fain have you approve. I speak of the temple<sup>e</sup>; which I request you to consider in proportion to the affection you bear me. I have no hesitation about the kind of building, being satisfied with Clautius's design; nor about the thing itself, which is deter-

d; but I sometimes doubt about the situation. Therefore that you would think about it. Yes, I consecrate her, as much as can be done in learned times, with monuments of every kind, drawn from the best sense of all writers, Greek and Latin. This may perhaps renew sound; but I consider myself bound, as it is, by a vow and promise; and that long space of time, when I shall cease to be, influences me more than this short period, which, however, is to me too long. For, after trying every-thing, I find nothing in which I can acquiesce. I was engaged in that treatise about which I wrote to you before, I was, as it were, cherishing offerings. Now I reject everything, and find nothing better than solitude; which Philippos has interrupted, as I apprehended. For after paying compliments to me yesterday, he immediately left for Rome. I have sent you the letter I wrote to Brutus at your recommendation. I will take care to have it transmitted along with yours. I have, however, sent a copy of it to that, if you do not approve of it, you may send it. When you say that my domestic affairs are regularly administered, I should like to know what you allude to. There are some about which I am solicitous. See that Julius does not fail me. For what Libo proposes, as Eros writes me word, I consider as mine. Respecting my principal, I trust to Sulpicius and Egnatius. Why should you trouble me about Appuleius, when the excuse is so obvious?

Consider how difficult it is for you to come as you propose. For it is a long journey; cannot take leave of you without great pain at departure, which it may perhaps be necessary for you to make speedily. But all as you wish.

For whatever you do I shall think to be for the best, and done for my sake. Having I yesterday from other letters the circumstance of Antonius's approach, I was surprised should be nothing said about it in yours. I may possibly have been written the day it was sent. Not that I care about such trifles. But I suppose he is come up about his affairs. As to what you mention of Terentia's going about the witnesses to my will, in the same way, be assured that I care nothing about it, and give me room to admit any trifling or new conjectures.

But what resemblance is there between these cases? She would not employ those who ought would inquire, unless they knew what I intended. Was there any danger of that in my case? However, let her do as I do. I will give her to be read by whom she pleases: he will tell me I could not have behaved more honourably towards my grandchild than I have done. I do not call upon her to attest it; in the same way, it never entered into my mind; next, not for that reason, because it was of no consequence. Yourself know (if only you recollect) I desired you at the time to bring some people. For what need was there of that? Indeed I meant your attendants: upon whom you suggested that I should send to Silius:

see few words how strongly is expressed the want of solid consolation, which is only to be found in the

and was he with concern for his daughter, and for the republic.

whence it arose that I sent to Publius: but neither was necessary. You will manage this as you think best.

LETTER XIX.

THIS place is indeed pleasant, and open to the sea, and capable of being seen both from Antium and from Circæi; but we must consider how, amongst all the change of possessors, who may be innumerable in an endless posterity (if only this state of things should last), that which is consecrated may still subsist. I have now no need of revenue, and can be content with a little. I sometimes think of getting some of the gardens on the other side of the Tiber; for this reason, that I know nothing which would be so much frequented. Which of them it should be, we will consider when we meet; but the temple must be finished this summer. At all events settle with Apella, the Chian, about the pillars. I approve of what you mentioned about Cocceius and Libo; and especially about my judgship<sup>1</sup>. Respecting the bond<sup>2</sup>, you will let me hear when you have discovered anything; yet I should like to know what Cornificius's agents say, but would not have you give yourself much trouble about it while you are so engaged. Respecting Antonius, Balbus also wrote to me in a joint letter with Oppius, and with your concurrence, that I need not be disturbed. I returned my thanks to them: but, as I have before told you, I would have you understand that I neither was disturbed at that news, nor shall I now be disturbed at anything. If Pansa has set out to-day, as you supposed, henceforward begin to inform me what you expect about Brutus's arrival; that is, on what day. If you know where he now is, you will easily be able to form a conjecture. Concerning what you mention to Tiro about Terentia, I entreat you, my Atticus, to undertake the whole business. You perceive that some duty on my part is implicated, upon which you are fully informed; and some suppose young Cicero's fortune to be concerned. The former consideration weighs far the most with me, as being more sacred and important; especially as I conceive this latter to be neither well founded nor settled.

LETTER XX.

You seem not yet entirely to understand how indifferent I am about the arrival of Antonius, and about everything of the kind. On the subject of Terentia I wrote to you in the letter I sent yesterday. When you exhort me, and say that others expected it of me likewise, that I should dissemble the excess of my affliction; can I do more than spend whole days in study? Though I do it, not for the sake of dissembling, but rather of soothing and healing my mind; and if I do not reap adequate advantage, surely I do enough for appearance. I together. Believe me, I am influenced but by one motive, upon which I know that I am wild. Yet humour this my folly, as you do. For as to what you say of the "repose of old age"; that consideration is at an end; I am in pursuit of other things.

<sup>3</sup> It is uncertain to what this alludes; perhaps some occasion of Cicero's acting as a Judge, from which Atticus may have got him excused.

LETTER XXVI.

SICA writes me word, that even if he should not come to any agreement with A. Silius, yet he will come here on the 23d. I readily forgive your occupations, with which I am well acquainted; and doubt not of your disposition, or rather your wish and earnest desire, that we may be together. With respect to Nicias, if I were in a state to enjoy his kindness, I should be particularly glad to have him with me; but to me solitude and retirement is a province<sup>1</sup>. Because Sica was contented to bear this, I am the more desirous of seeing him. Besides, you know the weakness and delicacy of our friend Nicias, and his habits in regard to food. Why then should I be a trouble to him, while he can be no pleasure to me? Nevertheless, his goodwill is gratifying to me. One subject<sup>2</sup> you mention to me, upon which I am resolved to say nothing in return; for I hope I have prevailed with you to save me from that trouble. My compliments to Pilia and to Attica.

LETTER XXVII.

RESPECTING the Silian affair, though the conditions are not unknown to me, yet I expect to hear all about it to-day from Sica. Cotta's villa, which you say you do not know, is beyond Silius's, with which I think you are acquainted; it is a poor place, and very small. It has no land about it; no space for any other purpose, though enough for what I want. I look for notoriety. But if we come to an agreement about Silius's gardens, that is, if you agree (for it rests entirely with you) we need think no more about Cotta. With regard to Cicero, I will do as you mention, and shall leave it to him to fix the time. You will get exchanged what money is necessary. If you find out anything from Aledius you will, as you mention, write me word. I perceive from your letters, as you must also from mine, that we have nothing new to say. The same subjects recur every day, and are long since worn out: yet can I not refrain from writing daily, that I may hear from you in return. Upon the subject of Brutus, however, you may have some intelligence; for I imagine you know by this time where he means to wait for Pansa. If, as is usual, in the nearest part of the province, he will be likely to arrive about the beginning of next month. I should be glad if it were later; as I have many reasons for avoiding Rome; so that I even doubt if I should not offer him some excuse, which I see would be very easy. But there is time enough to think of it. My compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XXVIII.

I HAVE learned no more about Silius from my own conversation with Sica, than from his letter: for he wrote very accurately. If therefore anything occurs to you in the communication you may have with him, you will let me know it. Upon the subject<sup>1</sup>, about which you suppose some notice has been sent to me, whether it has been sent or not, I cannot tell; certainly nothing has reached me. Do you therefore proceed as you have begun; and if you can so settle it (which, to say the truth I do not expect) as to get her<sup>2</sup> approbation, you may if you please make use of Cicero. It may be of some consequence to him<sup>3</sup>, that he should appear to have wished it for her sake: to me it signifies nothing, excepting so far as you know<sup>4</sup>, which I greatly regard. When you recall me to my usual habits, I must say that I have long since mourned for the republic, though I did it more gently; for I had something on which my mind could repose. Now I am quite incapable of maintaining the same intercourse and way of life. Nor in this do I think that I need trouble myself with the opinions of other people: my own inward sense is of more weight with me than the talk of the world. While I have been consoling myself in study, I have no reason to be dissatisfied with the advantage I have gained. I have lessened my repining; my sorrow I neither could, nor, if I could, should I wish it. You rightly interpret my wishes respecting Triarius. But do nothing without their approbation. I love him even in his death; I am the guardian of his children, and bear affection towards the whole family. With regard to the Castrician business, if Castricius wishes to receive a price for his slaves, and will consent to its being paid in the manner that payments are now made<sup>5</sup>, certainly nothing is more convenient. But if he is determined to take away the slaves themselves, it does not appear to me to be equitable; since you desire me to tell you what I think. I should be sorry that my brother Quintus should have any trouble about it. And I think I understand that you are of the same opinion<sup>6</sup>. If Publius waits for the equinox, as you say Aledius told you, I suppose he will soon sail<sup>7</sup>. He told me he should go by way of Sicily. Whether he does go, and when, I should like to know. And I wish, at some time when it is convenient to you, that you would visit the little Lentulus<sup>8</sup>, and send him such of my slaves as you think proper. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XXIX.

SILIUS, you say, is to be with you to-day. Tomorrow therefore, or rather when you can, you

Let me know if you have anything to tell me having seen him. I do not wish to avoid this, yet I do not expect to derive from him any consolation. But there are reasons why I should like to be at Rome at this time; if these come, I must devise some excuse to Brutus; and, things now are, they seem likely to continue. I bring this business of the gardens to some conclusion. The chief object is what you know. The consideration is, that I want something myself. For I can neither bear to live in the distance nor to be at a distance from you. For this my mind finds nothing more suitable than that place. On this subject I am persuaded of your concurrence; and the more so because I think (and I understand you are of the same opinion) that I am loaded with great affection by Oppius and Balbus. Would have you communicate to them how, and why, I wish for these gardens; but it can only be done when that Faberian business is settled. Find out therefore whether they will consent; or how far they can be induced, if I do part of my claim upon early payment; for fear of getting the whole. In short you will tell me if they are disposed to give me any assistance towards this design. If they will, it is a point gained; if not, let us strive by any means to accomplish it. Consider it as that ancient maxim of old age," as you expressed it, or as my saying, "Nothing more is to be thought of that place." If I cannot get this, I must try about Appian's. Lami's I conceive to be unattainable.

LETTER XXX.

Now what I shall say to you; but there is nothing. The same day after day. I am obliged to you for going to see Lentulus. Let me know what servants, and what number you think. Respecting Silius's inclination to sell, and the price, you seem to apprehend, in that place, that he may not choose it; and, in that place, that he may not accede to the terms. If of a different opinion; but I agree with you. I have written to Egnatius, as he wished. No objection to your speaking with Clodius according to Silius's desire; and this is better than would write to Clodius, as he asked me to do with regard to Castricius's slaves<sup>a</sup>. I think that Egnatius<sup>b</sup> should manage it; as you say that you suppose will be done. Pray see how the account is settled with Ovia<sup>c</sup>. Since you say it was night<sup>d</sup> when you wrote, I shall say something more in to-day's letter.

Her Oppius and Balbus, who were concerned in Faberius in conducting Caesar's affairs, would be to promote the payment to Cicero, especially if I tried to relinquish part of his claim on prompt of the remainder. See letter 47 of this book.

Letter 28 of this book.

Silius was a banker employed by both Marcus and Cicero. In this transaction the latter was concerned in this book.

It is supposed that Atticus had alleged this as a pretext for abruptly concluding his letter.

LETTER XXXI.

SICA will be surprised at Silius's having changed his mind<sup>a</sup>. For my part, I am more surprised at your saying, that if I should suggest a different purchase, (which he will not hear of, having destined it to some other purpose,) you think he may be induced to sell. For he imputes to his son the cause of his refusal; which seems to me not unreasonable, considering that his son is everything he could wish. You ask me what is the highest price I would give; and how much I prefer these gardens to those of Drusus. I have never been there. The Coponian villa<sup>a</sup> I know to be old, and not large, and that it has a noble wood. But I know the produce of neither; which however I think it would be prudent to ascertain: though either of them are valuable to me from my particular circumstances, not from the computation of their real worth. But I would have you consider whether it is in my power to purchase them. If I could sell the Faberian property, I should not hesitate to conclude even on prompt payment for Silius's, if only he can be induced to sell. If he refuses to sell, I would apply to Drusus on the terms which Egnatius told you he demanded. Hermogenes<sup>a</sup> may also be a great assistance to me in making a prompt payment. Do you only admit of my being in the disposition of one who is desirous of purchasing: yet while I am a slave to my wishes and my grief, I am willing to be directed by you. I have received a letter from Egnatius<sup>b</sup>, should he have any conversation with you, you will let me know; for it will be most convenient to negotiate through him; and this I think should be done, for I do not see how it is possible to come to any conclusion with Silius. Compliments to Pilia and Attica. I have written this with my own hand. Pray think what it is to be done.

LETTER XXXII.

PUBLILIA<sup>c</sup> has written to me to say that her mother, in a conversation with Publius<sup>d</sup>, agreed to come with him to visit me; and she adds, that if I would permit her, she would come at the same time. She uses many entreaties for this purpose, and begs me to write in answer. You see how embarrassing this is. I replied that I was even more afflicted, than when I had told her I wished to be alone; and therefore was not disposed to let her come to me at this time. I thought, if I made no reply, that she would come with her mother. Now I do not think she will: for it was evident that the letter was not her own. But I wish to avoid altogether, what I see will happen, that they should come to me. There is only one way of avoiding

<sup>d</sup> This letter probably respected the sale of Drusus's place. But it may be observed that Egnatius, as Cicero's agent, had some concern with Silius likewise, and with Castricius, as appears by the preceding letters; though the latter was on Quintus's account.

it*; which I do not like; but it is necessary. I now therefore beg you to find out how long I may remain here, without being molested. You will manage this, as you mention, with prudence. I wish you would propose to Cicero, provided it appears to you reasonable, that he should accommodate the expenses of this foreign residence to the rents arising from Argiletus and Aventinus<sup>f</sup>, which would easily have satisfied him, if he had been at Rome, and hired a house, as he thought of doing. And when you have made this proposal to him, I should be glad if you would arrange the rest in such a manner, that I may out of those rents supply him with what is necessary. I will engage that the expenses of neither Bibulus, nor Acidinus, nor Messala, who I hear are to be at Athens, will exceed the receipts from those rents. I wish you therefore first to see who are the people to hire them, and at what rate; then, that there may be somebody<sup>g</sup> who will pay to the day; likewise what provision and equipage is wanted by the way. At Athens there can certainly be no occasion for horses; and I have at home more than can be wanted for his use on the road; as you also observe.

LETTER XXXIII.

I SHOULD like, as I told you in my letter yesterday, if Silius prove such as you suppose, and Drusus be unaccommodating, that you should make overtures to Damasippus. He has, I think, allotted portions on the shore, of I know not how many acres, at a fixed price, with which I am not acquainted. Whatever arrangements you make, you will let me know. I am very anxious about my little Attica's health; and should even fear there was some mismanagement; but that the integrity of the tutor, and attention of the physician, and the regularity of the whole family in every way, forbid me to entertain such a suspicion. Take care then. I can say no more.

LETTER XXXIV.

HERE I could remain contentedly for one in trouble, even without Sica; for Tiro is better. But since you say that I must take care I am not molested (by which I understand that you are unacquainted with the certain day of their journey<sup>h</sup>) I have thought it more convenient for me to go thither<sup>i</sup>. And I perceive that you are of the same opinion. To-morrow therefore to Sica's villa near Rome; thence, as you advise, I think of going into the neighbourhood of Ficulea. Respecting what you wrote to me, as I am coming up myself, we will see about it together. I am most sensible of your kindness, diligence and prudence, both in the management of my affairs, and in consulting and advising me in the letters you send.

* By going himself to see them. See letter 34 of this book.

LETTER XXXV.

SHOULD you have come to any understanding with Silius, I shall be glad to be informed of it the very day that I arrive at Sica's house; and especially what part he wishes to have excepted. For when you mention the boundary, we must take care that it be not the very place, for the sake of which, as you know, I have been led to think of the whole business. I send you a letter from Hirtius, which is both recent and kindly written. Before I last parted from you, it never entered into my mind that a sum was to be distributed to the people, equal to the excess above a certain expense allowed by law to be laid out on a monument. This would not much affect me, but that somehow (perhaps foolishly) I should not like it to be called by any other name, than that of a temple. But however I may wish this, I doubt if I shall be able to attain it without altering the situation<sup>j</sup>. Pray consider how this is. For though I am less impatient, and have nearly collected myself; yet I stand in need of your counsel. Therefore I entreat you again and again more earnestly, than you like, or bear to be entreated by me, to embrace this subject with your whole heart.

LETTER XXXVI.

I WISH to have a temple: from this I am not to be diverted. I am anxious to avoid the appearance of a monument; not so much on account of the legal penalty, as that I may accomplish the dedication. This I might do by erecting it near the house; but, as I have often said, I am afraid of a change of possessors. In an open field, wherever I should erect it, it seems probable that it may retain the respect of posterity. You must bear with this weakness of mine; for such I acknowledge it to be. I cannot communicate, not even with myself, so freely as with you. If the thing, the place, the design, meets your approbation, I beg you to read over the law and send it to me. If any method of avoiding it should occur, I shall avail myself of it. If you write to Brutus, unless you think it improper, send him for objecting to be in Cumanum on account of the rumour which he mentioned to you: for, to my apprehension, he could do nothing more uncivil. If you think it right to proceed in the affair of the temple, as I have begun, I should be glad if you would exert and quicken Cluavius<sup>k</sup>. For, even if another situation appear preferable, I imagine I shall still want his advice and assistance. To-morrow you will perhaps be at your villa<sup>l</sup>.

LETTER XXXVII.

YESTERDAY I received two letters from you: one by Hilarius, dated the day before,—the other by the messenger on the same day. The same day also I received one from Ægypta the freed-man.

<sup>j</sup> There were already many monuments erected in these gardens on the other side of the Tiber, amongst which it would be difficult to distinguish the temple he proposed to consecrate to his daughter.

ing that Pilia and Attica were quite well. This was delivered to me the thirteenth day. I thank you for sending me Brutus's letter. He is also to me. This letter I send you, and enclose a copy of my answer to it. Respecting the temple, if you find nothing for me in the garden (which you may surely find, if you have that which I need for which you certainly have), I highly approve your proposal about Tusculanum. How judicious you may be in your plans, as indeed you are, yet, unless you took a real interest in my doing what I so ardently wish, that idea could have come so appositely into your mind. But now I require notoriety. Therefore you must apply for me the possession of these gardens. Most frequented are Scapula's; besides, there is a vicinity to where you are, that it may not take the whole day to go thither. For this I should exceedingly wish you to confer with Otho<sup>a</sup>, if he is in Rome, before your departure. If there is nothing to be had, though I need to bear with my folly, yet I shall go and make you quite angry; for Drusus at least would not sell. If then there is anything else, not be my fault if I do not buy it; but in no way to take care that I commit no error. The best way of taking care is, if I can accomplish anything about Scapula's gardens<sup>b</sup>. I wish likewise to inform me how long you will stay at your villa near Rome. I have need of your aid and your influence with Terentia; but you as you think right: for I know that where you are, you take more interest in it than I myself. Hirtius has written to me that Pompeius<sup>c</sup> has left Corduba and fled into the northern provinces of Spain, and that Cneus I know not whither, for it is of little consequence. I know nothing more. He dates his letter from Narbonne, the 18th of April. You are doubtful about the shipwreck of the vessel; let me know therefore if any certain news has arrived. With respect to your grief from my sadness, you will greatly relieve me if I can find a place for the temple. Many thanks to my mind in favour of the dedication. I am greatly in want of a situation. Therefore, see Otho about it.

LETTER XXXVIII.

There is no doubt you were very busy, which was the reason of your not sending me any letter: but I am a idle fellow not to attend your convenience when it was sent for that very purpose. At this time as anything has detained you, I imagine you are at your villa. I continue writing here all the while for your relief, but yet with some distraction. Asinius Pollio has written to me on the subject of our unnatural relation<sup>d</sup>. What the albus lately intimated pretty plainly, and more reservedly, he has openly declared. I am deeply concerned if there were any room for new sources of grief. But can anything be more abominable? What a dangerous man! Though for my part—but I will restrain my feeling. Let me hear from you, as you may be at leisure; for there is nothing that presses. As to what you say, that I ought now to show the firmness of my mind,—and that some speak of me more severely than either you or Brutus write: if any persons suppose that my mind is broken and has lost its energy, let them know the extent and kind of studies in which I am engaged,—and I conceive, if they are men, they will think either that I do not deserve reproof, having so far roused myself as to bring my mind disengaged to the discussion of difficult questions; or if I have chosen this method of diverting my grief, which is at once the most liberal and the most worthy of a man of learning, that I ought rather to be commended. But while I do everything that I can for my relief, do you effect that, for which I perceive you are not less earnest than I am. I seem to owe this to myself, and to be incapable of ease till I have discharged it, or seen a prospect of discharging it,—that is, till I have a place such as I want. If Scapula's heirs, as you say that Otho told you, mean to have the gardens divided into four parts and valued, there is indeed no room for a purchaser. But if they are to be publicly sold, we will see what can be done. That Publician place, belonging to Trebonius and Cusinius, was offered me: but you know it is a mere barn; and I do not approve of it at all. Clodia's I like; but apprehend it is not to be sold. Though you say you quite revolt from Drusus's gardens, yet I must be content with those, unless you can find something else. The building I do not regard; for I shall build nothing more than I should do otherwise. The 4th and 5th books of Antisthenes's Cyrus please me like the other works of the same author, who is more ingenious than learned.

LETTER XXXIX.

WHEN the messenger arrived without a letter from you, I supposed the reason of your not writing to be that you had written the day before what I answered in that letter. Yet I had expected to hear something relating to the letter of Asinius Pollio. But I measure your leisure too much by my own. However, unless there should be something of importance, I would not have you think it necessary to write till you are quite at liberty. I would do as you advise about the messengers, if there were any letters, of consequence, as there were formerly; when, during the shorter days, yet the messengers constantly returned to their time. And there was something, as Silius, Drusus, and some other matters. Now, if it were not for Otho, there would be nothing to write about: even that is deferred. Yet I find relief when I talk with you in my absence; and still more when I read your letters. But since you are out of town (for so I suppose), and there is no particular occasion for writing, our correspondence may rest till something new occurs.

LETTER XL.

WHAT will be the nature of Caesar's censure<sup>r</sup> in opposition to my commendation, I see from the book which Hirtius has sent me, in which he collects together the faults of Cato, while he speaks very highly of me. I have, therefore, sent the book to Musca, that he might give it to your librarians,—for I wish to have it made public; and that this may be the sooner done, I should be glad if you would give directions to your people. I often attempt to compose something in the way of advice<sup>s</sup>, but I cannot please myself. In this I am countenanced by the address of Aristotle and of Theopompus to Alexander. But what resemblance is there between the two cases? They wrote what was at once honourable to themselves and agreeable to Alexander. Can you devise anything of such a kind? As for me, I can suggest nothing. When you say that you fear my influence and authority may be lessened by this my grief, I know not what people should either blame or require. Is it that I should not grieve? How is that possible? That I should not sink under it? Who ever did so less? While I remained at your house, whom did I exclude? Who, that came, could be offended with me? From you I went to Astura. Those lively spirits who find fault with me cannot read so much as I wrote. How well, is nothing to the purpose: but the kind of writing was such as nobody with a broken spirit could execute. I have been thirty days in my gardens<sup>t</sup>. Who ever found a want of access to me, or of free conversation? And now I am so engaged in reading and in writing, that my attendants find it more difficult to bear their leisure than I to bear my labour. If anybody asks why I am not at Rome? Because it is the recess. Why I am not in any of my farms, which are suitable to such a time? Because I could not easily bear so much company. Therefore I remain, where he<sup>u</sup> who possessed that excellent place at Baie used every year to spend this season. When I come to Rome, neither my looks nor conversation will subject me to reproof. I have lost for ever that gaiety with which I used to season the sadness of these times; but there will be found no want of constancy and firmness either in my mind or speech. Respecting Scapula's gardens, it seems possible, partly by your influence partly by mine, to get them submitted to public auction. Unless this is done I shall be excluded. But if we come to an open sale, my desire of possession will outweigh Otho's wealth: for as to what you mention about Lentulus, it does not rest upon that. Let but the Faberian business<sup>v</sup> be settled, and continue to exert yourself as you do, and I shall get what I want. In answer to your inquiry how long I shall remain here,—it will be a few days; but I am not certain: as soon as I have determined, I will write to you. Do you likewise let me know how long you mean to stay in your villa. The very day on which I send this I have also received, both by letter and by word of mouth, the same account you mention of Pilia and of Attica.

LETTER XLI. -

I HAVE nothing to say; yet I wish to know where you are,—and, if you are gone, or going, out of town, when you mean to return. You will therefore inform me. And respecting my movements, which you desire to know, I have determined to be at Lanuvium on the 14th, and from thence to go the day following either to Tusculanum or to Rome; which I do, you shall know the same day. You know how querulous misfortune is,—not indeed towards you; but yet I am grown very impatient about the temple: and unless this is, I do not say completed, but unless I see it in progress, I will venture to say (and you will receive it as you are accustomed), my vexation will vent itself upon you, however undeservedly. But you will bear with me in writing this, as you do, and have borne with all my weaknesses. I should be glad to have you collect all your consolation in this one object. If you ask, what it is I wish for? First Scapula's gardens, then Clodia's; afterwards, if Silius refuses and Drusus is unreasonable, those of Cusinius and Trebonius; I believe they belong now to Terentius; I know they did belong to Rebilus. But if you prefer Tusculanum, as you have signified in some of your letters, I shall not object to it. This then is what you must accomplish, if you wish me to be comforted; whom you now accuse more severely than is natural to you; but you do it from your great affection, and overcome perhaps by my foolishness. Yet if you wish me to be comforted this is the greatest comfort; or, if you would know the truth, the only one. If you have read Hirtius's letter,—which I consider as a specimen of the censure that Caesar has written upon Cato,—I should like you to inform me, at your convenience, what you think of it. To return to the subject of the temple; unless it is finished this summer, which is yet all before us, I shall not think myself free from guilt<sup>w</sup>.

LETTER XLII.

(Græv. xliii.)

I HAVE determined to sleep at Lanuvium on the 14th, as I mentioned to you before; from thence I shall go either to Rome or to Tusculanum. You shall know both beforehand. You do rightly in taking no notice of the relief which this business may justly afford me; it being such, believe me, as you could not suppose. The thing itself shows how earnestly I desire it, when I venture to confess it to you, who, I suspect, do not very much approve of it: but in this you must bear with my weakness. Bear with it? Nay, you must even forward it. About Otho I dare not hope; perhaps because I wish it. Besides, the purchase exceeds my ability, especially in opposition to one who is both desirous of having it, and rich, and one of the heirs. Next to this I should like Clodia's. But if these cannot be had, conclude what you will. I consider myself bound by a stricter obligation than anybody ever was by that of a vow. You will see, likewise, the Trebonian gardens, notwithstanding the owners are <sup>w</sup> In letter 18 of this book he had said that he considered himself as bound by a vow. He alludes to the same thing likewise in letter 43 of this book.

st; and as I mentioned to you yesterday, you think also about Tusculanum. The summer certainly not be suffered to slip away without something.

LETTER XLIII.

(Græc. Book xiii. Letter xxvi.) entirely approve of what you mention about lius's portion<sup>2</sup>. You will therefore act accordingly. That is my first wish<sup>3</sup>; next to that, this; and if I can get neither, I fear I may be outrageous and rush upon Drusus. I use moderation in my desire of that object, you know. Therefore at intervals I incline to Tusculanum. For anything is better than not to have finished this summer. In my present I have no place where I can be more at my ease than at Astura. But as those who are with me stay away (I suppose because they cannot bear my sadness); though I should be very well able to remain; yet, as I mentioned to you, I go from hence, that I may not appear despondent. But which way? To Lanuvium? I try to go to Tusculanum; but will immediately let you know. You will bring your writing<sup>4</sup> to an end. On your own part, it is not to be believed how much I sleep in the day; and even in the night; for I cannot sleep. Yesterday also I accomplished a great deal for Cæsar, because you seemed to wish it. You thought it expedient, there is no harm in being written. As things are at present, there is no necessity for sending it; but this shall be my pleasure. I will however send you a copy of the ships from Lanuvium, unless it happens that Rome. But you shall know to-morrow.

LETTER XLIV.

very well pleased that Hirtius should have written to you with sympathy about me, for he has been kindly; and I am still better pleased that he should not have sent me his letter, for you are to me even more kindly. I wish the book, which I sent me upon Cato, to be published by the varians for this reason, that his praise may be increased by the censure of that party. In acting thus, Mustella you have a person extremely kind and one who has been kindly disposed to me ever since the Pontian<sup>b</sup> business. I wish to get something done<sup>c</sup>. What else, but to go to a purchaser<sup>d</sup>? This may be done any of the heirs. And I apprehend Musculus will do it, if you ask him. You will thus as was one of the heirs of Scapula, together with Atella, and Crispus.

difficulty consisted in overcoming his repugnance to a place which sadly reminded him of his daughter. He seems to have been engaged in settling his affairs with which these letters, litteras, were probably procure for me the place which I wish, for the purpose which I have at heart; and besides, "a repose for my old age<sup>f</sup>." For those of Silius, and of Drusus, do not appear to me sufficiently respectable for a family residence. How would it become one to remain for any length of time in such a villa as that? I should therefore prefer, first, Otho's; and, next to that, Clodia's. If nothing can be done, either some stratagem must be practised upon Drusus<sup>g</sup>, or I must be content with Tusculanum. In shutting yourself up at home, you have acted prudently. But pray use despatch, and restore yourself to me free from care. I shall go from hence, as I before-mentioned, to Lanuvium on the 14th, and the day following to Tusculanum. For I have subdued my mind<sup>h</sup>, and perhaps conquered it, if only I can persevere. You shall know therefore, perhaps to-morrow, at all events the day after. But pray, how is this? Philotimus affirms that Pompeius is not shut up in Carteia; about which Oppius and Balbus sent me the copy of a letter to Clodius Patavinus, declaring that they believed it to be true; but that a great war is still maintained<sup>i</sup>. He is in the habit of being a complete Fulviniaster<sup>j</sup>; but yet, if you have any intelligence, let me know it. I want also to know what is the truth respecting Caninius' shipwreck<sup>k</sup>.

LETTER XLV.

WHILE I have been here<sup>l</sup>, I have completed two long treatises: for I have no other means of deviating, as it were, from the path of wretchedness. Even if you have nothing to say, which I foresee will be the case, yet I wish you to tell me that, if only it is not in these terms. The accounts of Attica are excellent. I am concerned about your languor<sup>m</sup>, notwithstanding you say it is nothing. In Tusculanum I shall have the advantage of more frequently hearing from you, and sometimes seeing you. In other respects things are more supportable at Astura; nor are the objects, which revive my grief, more distressing here than everywhere else<sup>n</sup>; though in truth, wherever I am, they are with me. I wrote to you about your neighbour<sup>o</sup> Cæsar, because I had learned

it from your letter. I would rather have him comrade with Quirinus than with Public<sup>9</sup> Safety. Let Hirtius be made public<sup>9</sup>; for I was of the same opinion, which you mention, that while our friend's genius is applauded, his attempt to censure Cato would be derided.

LETTER XLVI.

I HAVE never complained of your not writing; for I perceive what you mention<sup>7</sup>. Besides I suspect, or rather know, that you can have had nothing to say. On the 8th I supposed you to be out of town, and concluded that there was nothing. I shall nevertheless send to you almost every day; for I would rather send in vain than that you should have nobody to take your letters, in case there should be anything with which you think I ought to be acquainted. On the 8th I received your empty letter, as you call it; for what had you to write about? Yet, such as it was, it was not unpleasant to me to know even this, that you had no news. You mentioned, however, something about Clodia. Where then is she? or when will she come? That place pleases me so well, that, next to Otho's<sup>8</sup>, I like nothing better. But I do not suppose either that she will sell; for she takes pleasure in it, and is in no want of money: and as for the other, you are aware of the difficulties. Yet pray let us try, that we may devise some means of gratifying my wishes. I think of leaving this place to-morrow, and going either to Tusculanum or home<sup>9</sup>, and afterwards perhaps to Arpinum. When I know for certain, I will write to you. It had occurred to me to remind you of doing the very thing which you are doing; for I thought you could more conveniently transact the same business at home, without suffering yourself to be interrupted.

LETTER XLVII.

(Græc. xli.)

I HOPE to conquer my feelings, and to go from Lanuvium to Tusculanum. For I must either renounce for ever that estate (since the same painful sensations will remain, only in a less degree) or I know not what it signifies whether I go there now, or ten years hence. Since the being thus reminded, is nothing more than what constantly wastes me day and night. What then, you will say, do your studies afford no relief? In this respect I fear they may even do the contrary; as I might otherwise perhaps be more insensible. For to a cultivated mind nothing is without feeling and interest.

<sup>7</sup> Near to the temple of Quirinus was situated the temple of Public Safety; and Cicero means to say that he should be sorry to have any tyrant in a place of safety.

LETTER XLVIII.

(Græc. xlvii.)

Do then, as you mention, so that you put yourself to no inconvenience. For two words will be sufficient. Or I will go up, if it is necessary. This therefore as you can.<sup>12</sup> About Murena is as you propose; though it is a great undertaking<sup>13</sup>. For this reason I more incline to Clodia. But in either case the Faberian account must be settled; about which there will be no harm in your having some conversation with Balbus; and indeed letting him know, what is the truth, that I am desirous of purchasing, and unable to do it without the discharge of that debt, and do not dare to engage upon an uncertainty. But since Clodia is to be at Rome, and you consider it so desirable, I look wholly that way; not that I should not prefer the other; but it is a great concern, and an arduous contest with one who is eager, who is rich, who is heir. Though in point of eagerness I will yield to nobody: in other respects I am inferior. But of this when we meet. Make<sup>14</sup> public Hirtius's book, as you do. Respecting Philotimus<sup>15</sup>, I also thought the same. I foresee that your house will become more valuable from having Caesar for your neighbour<sup>16</sup>. I am expecting the return of my messenger to-day. He will bring me an account of Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XLIX.

(Græc. xlviii.)

I CAN easily believe that you are glad to be at home. But I should like to know how much remains to be done; or whether you have already finished. I am expecting you in Tusculanum; and the rather, because you wrote word to Tiro, that you were coming immediately, and added that you thought it necessary. While you were here, I was very sensible how much good you did me; but I am much more sensible of it since your departure. Therefore, as I mentioned to you in a former letter, I will either go wholly to you; or you shall come to me, so far as it will be consistent with your occupations.

LETTER L.

(Græc. xlix.)

YESTERDAY, not long after you left me I think, some persons of smart appearance brought me despatches, and a letter from "C. Marius, the son of Caius, and grandson of Caius,"<sup>17</sup> urging me at great length, by the relationship between us, by the poem which I had inscribed with the name of Marius, by the eloquence of L. Crassus, his grandfather, to undertake his defence; and he sent me a detail of his case. I wrote to him in return,

<sup>13</sup> It must be remembered that, previous to the invention of printing, it was a work of great labour to make copies of a book for the use of the public.

<sup>14</sup> His intelligence about the war in Spain. See letter 44 of this book.

<sup>15</sup> See letter 45 of this book. This may be supposed to be said jestingly.

<sup>16</sup> This I take to be a transcript of the title assumed by this man, who was an impostor.

it he had no need of a patron, since the whole was in his relation Cæsar, who was an excellent man, and exceedingly liberal; but that nevertheless he should have my good wishes. What are these! That it should ever happen that Atticus should think of standing for the consulship! But enough of this. I am anxious about you. But I shall soon know how he does, for I met a person yesterday to see him; to whom at the same time I gave a letter for you. I send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar. I should be glad if you would let me know on what day the gardens are to be sold.

LETTER LI.

My proportion as your arrival cheered me, so your departure afflicted me. Therefore when you told me that is, when you have done with Sextus's business, you will come to me again. A single day will be valuable to me; I need not say, agreeable. I would myself go to Rome in order to be with you, had sufficiently made up my mind on a certain object.

LETTER LII.

(Græv. li.)

HAVE got Tiro with me sooner than I had expected. Nicias is also arrived; and I heard by that Valerius was coming. How many times they may be, I shall feel myself more at ease than if you alone were here. But I hope to see you after Peduceus's business. You give some satisfaction that it may even be sooner: but this is uncertain. About Virgilius do as you mention. It is however to know when the sale takes place, that you approve of my sending the letter to you. To say the truth, I quite agree in the necessity of doing so; and the rather, because there is nothing in it that is unbecoming a good man; good at least for the times, to which all persons on government direct us to submit. But now it was my desire that some of that party should read it first; which I wish you would take care of; and not let it be sent, unless you understand they quite approve of it. You will easily find whether they really think so, or only feigning would be to me a prohibition. But this will probe. Tiro has informed me of your opinion about Cærellia; that it is unbecoming my duty to remain in debt; and that you think I should give a note of hand—"This you fear; of the same who is before mentioned. See book ix. c. 5. Atticus, being a friend to Sextus Peduceus, wished to the sale of some part of his property. From the obscure hint contained in this expression, it is probable he might allude to his conduct in the senate respecting Cæsar's authority and administration. See letters 1 and 29 of this book.

The same who in the preceding letter is called Sextus Virgilius was one of the heirs of Scapula. [see letter ix. in book.] whose gardens Cicero wished to get. It is the sale of those gardens that he refers to in the subsequent sentence.

the other you entertain no fear." But these, and many other matters, when we meet. With your leave, however, the payment of the debt to Cærellia must be suspended, till I know about Meto and Faberius.

LETTER LIII.

(Græv. lii.)

You know L. Tullius Montanus who went with Cicero. I have received a letter from his sister's husband, saying that Montanus owes Plancus 25 sester tia (200*l.*) as surety for Flaminius; and that something had been requested of you by Montanus respecting this business. If you can assist him, either by speaking to Plancus, or by any other means, I should be truly glad that you would do it: my obligation to him demands it. If, as it may happen, you are better acquainted with the business than I am, or if you think that Plancus should be solicited, I wish you would write to me; that I may know what the case is, and what to ask of him. I am expecting to hear what you have done about the letter to Cæsar. I am not very anxious about Silius. You must get me either Scapula's gardens, or Clodia's. But you seem to be in some doubt about Clodia, whether she will come, or when, and whether the gardens will be to be sold. What is it I hear of Spinther's being divorced? You are very confident, you will say, in the copiousness of the Latin language, to undertake such subjects: but they are mere transcripts, and done with less labour than you may suppose. I have only to find words, and in these I abound.

LETTER LIV.

(Græv. liii.)

THOUGH I have nothing to say to you, yet I write, because I seem then to talk with you. There are with me here Nicias and Valerius. I expect to-day a letter from you written in the morning. There will perhaps be another in the afternoon, unless your correspondence with Epirus prevents you, which I would not interrupt. I send you letters to Marcianus and to Montanus, which I should be glad if you would inclose in your packet, unless that is already gone.

* The original is a verse, quoted also elsewhere from some unknown author. Cicero's meaning seems to be, that while Atticus was apprehensive of the debt being left unpaid, he did not advert to the embarrassment which it might occasion to Cicero to pay it, before he was himself sure of being paid by his own creditors, Meto and Faberius.

† To Athens. See letters 8 and 24 of this book.

‡ Silius's gardens. See letter 44 of this book.

§ Philosophical subjects, which, before Cicero, had not been treated in the Latin language. He goes on to say, that he drew his matter from the Greek writers, and had little trouble except in finding Latin expressions. In the conclusion of his treatise "De Finibus," we find it said in the person of Atticus,—"Sed mehercule pergrata mihi oratio tua: quæ enim dici latine posse non arbitrabar, ea dicta sunt a te, nec minus plane, quam dicuntur a Græciis."

|| Which Atticus was going to send to Buthrotum in Epirus, from whence Cicero's letters would be forwarded to Athens.

BOOK XIII.

[The arrangement of the letters in this book appears to be in several instances incorrect; yet the inconvenience, not to mention the difficulty, of altering it in a way that could be satisfactory, made it to be thought more desirable to preserve the order already established.]

LETTER I.

Nobody could have written more firmly or more temperately than you have done to Cicero<sup>1</sup>, or more entirely as I could wish. Your letters to the Tullii<sup>2</sup> are likewise extremely prudent. So that either these must have an effect<sup>3</sup>, or we must think no more about it. I see that you are using, or rather have already used, all diligence about the money<sup>4</sup>. If you succeed in this, I shall owe the gardens to you. There is no kind of possession which I should like better, especially for that purpose<sup>5</sup> in which I am engaged; and about which you prevent my impatience, by the assurance, or rather promise, for the summer<sup>6</sup>. Besides, for the decline of my life<sup>7</sup>, and the relief of my sorrow, nothing can be found more suitable. My wish for it sometimes urges me to exhort you; but I check myself; for I do not doubt but that in a matter, which you think I have much at heart, your wishes even exceed my own. Therefore understand this, as if it were really so. I am anxious to know what they<sup>8</sup> think of my letter to Cæsar. Nicias is much attached to you, as he ought to be, and is highly gratified by your remembrance of him. On my part I have a great affection for our friend Peduceus; and transfer to him all the regard I felt for his father; besides that I value him for his own sake, as much as I valued the other; and am much obliged to you for wishing to produce this mutual attachment between us. When you have examined the gardens, and have informed me about the letter<sup>9</sup>, I shall have some subject to write upon. But at all events I shall write to you; for there will always be something to say.

LETTER II.

Your early information was more gratifying to me, than the substance of your letter. For what can be more shameful? But I am now grown callous to such things, and have put off all feeling. I look for a letter from you to-day; not that I expect any news; for how should there be any?

<sup>10</sup> There is nothing to show certainly to what this alludes: but on comparison with book xii. letter 38, it is probable that Atticus might have written to Cicero on the subject of young Quintus.

But yet—you will order the letters to be taken to Oppius and Balbus; at the same time if you can meet with Piso, you will speak to him about the gold<sup>1</sup>. If Faberius arrives, you will see that the assignment is made (if indeed any is made) for as much as is due. You will receive the account from Eros. Ariarathes, Ariobarzanes' son<sup>2</sup>, is come to Rome. I imagine he wants to purchase some kingdom from Cæsar; for at present he has no place of his own to set his foot in. Our friend Sestius has been beforehand with me as his public attendant; which I do not regret; but as I have a great friendship with his brothers, arising from the important service I rendered them<sup>3</sup>, I have written to invite him to my house. As I send Alexander for this purpose, I shall deliver this letter to him. So to-morrow is Peduceus' sale: therefore as soon as you are at liberty<sup>4</sup>; though Faberius may perhaps be an impediment; but however when you can. Our Dionysius makes heavy complaints, and not without reason, that he is so long kept from his scholars. He has written to me at great length, and I suppose also to you. I apprehend he will absent himself some time longer. I am sorry; for I want the man very much.

LETTER III.

I AM expecting a letter from you; though not just yet; for I write this reply to your last early in the morning. I am so well satisfied with these assignments, as to entertain no other question about them, except what arises from your hesitation. For I do not quite take it in good part that you should refer to me, who, if I negotiated the business for myself, should do nothing but by your advice. But I understand you to do it rather from the accuracy with which you always act, than because you have any real doubt about their responsibility. For you do not approve of applying to Cælius, and are against selling any more<sup>5</sup>. In both which I agree with you. Therefore I must have recourse to these assignments. Otherwise you must for once<sup>6</sup> have been made surety, and in these very deeds. But everything shall rest upon me. As to the time of payment being distant, let me but get what I want; I imagine the day appointed by the auctioneer, or at least by the heir, will likewise be distant. See about Crispus and Mustella; and I should like to know what is the tion belonging to these two. I had been informed of Brutus's arrival; for my freed-man gyptia brought me a letter from him, which I did to you, as being kindly<sup>a</sup> written.

LETTER IV.

AM indebted to you for an elaborate account of the ten commissioners<sup>a</sup>. And indeed I believe I am right; for the son<sup>b</sup> was quaestor the year when Mummius was consul. Since you repeat your opinion, whether I am satisfied with the sureties, I repeat my answer<sup>c</sup>, that I am. If you can make arrangement with Piso<sup>d</sup>, bring that business to a conclusion, for Aulus<sup>e</sup> appears to be sincere. Perhaps you may be able to come sooner; but if at least let us be together when Brutus comes to usculum. I am very desirous that we should meet. You will be able to learn what day it will be if you give it in charge to a servant to inquire.

LETTER V.

HAD supposed that Sp. Mummius was one of the ten commissioners; but however—For it is rational that he should have been lieutenant to his father; and he certainly was at Corinth. I send Forquatus<sup>f</sup>. Talk with Silius<sup>g</sup>, as you promise, and urge him. He objected to the day of my coming being in May; to the rest he made no objection. But you will manage this also with the same care you do everything. About Crispus Mustella you will inform me as soon as you have settled anything. Since you promise to be here on Brutus's arrival, I am satisfied; especially as the intervening days will be employed on my chief concern<sup>h</sup>.

LETTER VI.

YOU have done properly about the aqueduct. I may not have to pay no tax on pillars<sup>i</sup>; but I think I heard from Camillus that the law concerning it has been altered. What answer can I make to more civil, than that Cato<sup>k</sup> is at present alone? And this answer applies not only to the co-heirs of Herennius, but to other cases, as you know; for you acted with me in the affair of the young Lucullus<sup>l</sup>, respecting the money which his guardian (for that ought to be noticed) had taken up in Greece. But he<sup>m</sup> acts liberally in saying that he will do nothing contrary to my wishes. When we meet, therefore, as you observe, we will resolve how to settle this business. You have done quite right to have a meeting with the other co-heirs. I have no copy of my letter to Brutus, which you ask for; but however it is safe; and Tiro says that you ought to have it; and, as I remember, at the same time with his expostulatory letter I sent you mine also in answer to him. You will take care that I escape the trouble of the judgeship<sup>n</sup>. I was quite ignorant of that Tuditanus who was great-grandfather to Hortensius, and supposed it to have been the son, who could not have been commissioner at that time. I consider it as certain that Mummius was at Corinth. For this Spurius, who lately died, often used to repeat to me some letters written in comic verses to his friends from Corinth. But I have no doubt he was lieutenant to his brother, and not one of the ten. And I have moreover understood that it was not customary formerly to admit among the commissioners those who were related to the commanders, as we, through ignorance, or rather negligence of their excellent institutions, sent M. Lucullus, and L. Murena, and others nearly allied, as commissioners to L. Lucullus. But it is most natural that he should have been among the first of his brother's lieutenants. How much trouble you take, while you both attend to these matters, and despatch my business, and are much less careful about your own concerns than about mine!

LETTER VII.

I HAVE had Sestius with me; and yesterday Theopompus arrived. He reported that letters had been received from Cæsar<sup>o</sup>, who said that he had determined to remain at Rome; and added the same reason which was mentioned in my letter<sup>p</sup>, lest in his absence his laws should be disregarded, as had been the case with the sumptuary law. This is very natural, and what I had suspected<sup>q</sup>. But these people must have their way<sup>r</sup>; unless you would have me persevere in these same<sup>s</sup> sentiments. He mentions also that Lentulus<sup>t</sup> is certainly divorced from Metella. But all this you know better than I. Write, then, what you will in reply, so that you write something. Though I am at a loss to conceive what you can write about, unless, perhaps, about Mustella, or unless you have seen Silius. Brutus came to Tusculanum<sup>a</sup> yesterday, past four in the afternoon; to-day, therefore, he will call upon me. I wish it had been while you were here. I desired he might be informed that you had waited for him as long as you could; that you would come when you heard of his arrival; and that I would, as I do, give you immediate notice of it.

LETTER VIII.

I HAVE positively nothing to say to you; for it is not long since you left me; and soon after you returned my triple tablets<sup>b</sup>. I shall be obliged to you to let the parcel be taken to Vestorius, and to desire somebody to inquire if any farm belonging to Q. Faberius<sup>c</sup> in the neighbourhood of Pompeii or of Nola is to be sold. I should be glad if you would send me Brutus's epitome of Cælius's history<sup>d</sup>, and get from Philoxenus Panætius's treatise on Prudence. I shall see you on the 15th with your family.

LETTER IX.

You had just gone away yesterday, when Trebatius came; and soon after, Curtius; the latter to pay his compliments; but on being invited, he stayed. Trebatius continues with me. This morning Dolabella came. We had a long conversation till the day was far advanced. I can describe nothing more attentive or more affectionate<sup>e</sup>. We came at length to the subject of young Quintus, of whom he related many particulars not to be repeated or named; and one thing of such a kind, that, unless the whole army knew it, I should not only not venture to dictate to Tiro, but not even to write it myself—But I check myself. Torquatus arrived very seasonably, while Dolabella was with me; and Dolabella in the kindest manner explained the terms I had used in discoursing with him<sup>f</sup>; for I had just been discoursing most urgently, which seemed to be gratefully received by Torquatus. I am longing to know if you have heard anything of Brutus<sup>g</sup>. Though Nicias supposed it to have actually taken place, but that the divorce was not approved: for which reason I am the more

<sup>b</sup> The Romans carried about with them little tablets of wood, or ivory, covered with wax, called pugillares, on which they wrote with a stilus. These tablets consisted of two, three, or more leaves, and were accordingly called duplices, triplices, &c. Cicero, it may be supposed, had written to Atticus on one of these consisting of three leaves, which Atticus had returned with his answer.

<sup>d</sup> Brutus may probably have epitomised several histories. In book xii. letter 5, we read of his epitome of Fannius's History; and Plutarch has reported, that on the evening previous to the battle of Pharsalia, he was engaged in making an abridgment of Polybius.

<sup>e</sup> Dolabella had married Cicero's daughter, whose death he so deplored. It is doubtful whether a divorce between them had taken place or not; at least there seems to have been no ill-will between the parties.

anxious, as well as you; that if any offence is taken, this may heal it. I am obliged to go to Arpinum, as it is necessary for me to regulate these small farms; and I am apprehensive that I may not be able to get away, if I wait till Cæsar comes; of whose arrival Dolabella entertains the same opinion which you formed from Messala's letter. When I get there, and find what business is to be done, I will write to inform you about the time of my return.

LETTER X.

I AM not surprised that you should be deeply concerned about Marcellus<sup>a</sup>, and apprehensive of all kinds of danger. For who would be afraid of what had never happened before, and what human nature seemed incapable of committing? So that everything is now to be feared. But do you<sup>b</sup> of all people transgress the evidence of history, by saying that I am the only consular<sup>c</sup> remaining? What! do you make no account of Servius? Though this has no weight with me, especially as I think the condition of the others<sup>d</sup> no way inferior. For what am I? Or what can I be, either at home or in public? In fact, unless it had occurred to my mind to occupy myself in writing, I should not know which way to turn myself. I think I must do, as you mention, to Dolabella, and take some subject of more common and public interest. I must at all events compose something; for he earnestly desires it. If Brutus has come to my conclusion<sup>e</sup>, you will take care to let me know it. I think he should conclude it as soon as possible, if only he has made his determination: for he will thus either extinguish or appease all idle talk. There are some who even talk to me about it. But he will conduct this best himself, especially if he also consults with you. It is my intention to go from hence the 22d. For here I have nothing to do; nor indeed there, nor anywhere; there's, however, there is something. I expect Spinther to-day; for Brutus has sent to inform me. In his letter he exculpates Cæsar on the death of Marcellus. But no suspicion would fall upon him, even if he had been killed insidiously. Now, however, when it is clear that it was done by Magius, is not the whole to be imputed to his insanity? I am at a loss to understand this<sup>f</sup>; therefore you will explain it; though I have no further doubt, excepting about what may have been the cause of Magius's madness; for whom he had even been surety at Sunium. It was perhaps that very circumstance; for he was insolvent. I imagine he may have asked something from Marcellus, and Marcellus may have replied, with that firmness which was natural to him, that "things seen near, and at a distance, have not the same aspect!"

<sup>a</sup> He had been killed near Athens by P. Magius Chilo, one who had been his friend.

LETTER XI.

I IMAGINED the removal to Arpinum to be a light matter; but I find it quite otherwise, since have been separated further from you. It was overer expedient, both for the sake of retelling the urns, and to avoid imposing on our friend Brutus a great burden of civility<sup>1</sup>. Hereafter we shall be able better to cultivate a mutual friendship in Tusculanum<sup>2</sup>. But at this time, when he was so good as to visit me daily, and I was unequal to go to him, he was deprived of all comfort in his Tusculan villa. If, then, Servilia<sup>3</sup> is arrived; if Brutus has concluded anything<sup>4</sup>, or even if he resolved upon it; when they go<sup>5</sup> to meet Caesar; short, whatever occurs, which I ought to know, I will inform me. Converse with Piso<sup>6</sup>, if you can: you see how ripe the business<sup>7</sup> is. Yet do not let yourself to inconvenience.

LETTER XII.

YOUR accounts of my dear Attica have much excited me; yet at the same time they have afforded me comfort. For your own consolation, pressed in the same letters, is a sufficient warrant of the relief of my anxiety. You have famously read the speeches in favour of Ligarius. Henceforward whatever I publish, I shall employ you to claim. As to what you say about Varro, you know that my compositions used formerly to consist of orations, or something of that kind, in which was impossible for me to introduce Varro's name. But since I entered upon these philosophical inquiries, Varro has already given me notice of a stand and weighty address<sup>1</sup>: two years have elapsed, while that Callipides<sup>2</sup> in his continual course has advanced a foot. In the mean time I prepared myself, as he desired, to make him a return "according to the same measure"—or better if I could<sup>3</sup>, for so Hesiodus adds. I have now pledged Brutus, with your approbation, that treatise on Foundation of Moral Duty, with which I am well pleased. And you have assured me of kind acceptance of it. I may as well, therefore, move from my Academical Disputations the preachers, who are distinguished characters of good fortunes, which before he did not know, when engaged to be his surety. Some have supposed this station to belong to the following letter; in which case it would mean that Cicero, since his removal to Arpinum, had the actual separation from Atticus more grievous than he had expected in distant contemplation.

On calling every day upon Cicero, who had not sufficiently recovered his spirits to wait upon Brutus in return. Brutus, as well as Cicero, appears to have had a residence in the neighbourhood of Tusculum.

indeed, but by no means philosophical, and discourse with too much subtilty, and substitute Varro in their place. For there are the opinions of Antiochus, to which he is much attached. I can find a place for Catulus and Lucullus elsewhere, if you approve of these persons; and I shall be glad if you will write in answer to me upon this subject. I have received a letter from Vestorius about Brinnius's auction<sup>1</sup>. He says that the business has without any dispute been referred<sup>2</sup> to me, to take place on the 24th of June. For they supposed that I should be in Rome, or in Tusculanum. You will therefore tell either your friend S. Vettius, my co-heir, or my friend Labeo, to defer a little the sale, as I shall not be in Tusculanum till about the 7th of July. You have with you Eros<sup>3</sup>, as well as Piso. Let us think, with all our minds, of Scapula's gardens. The day is at hand.

LETTER XIII.

IN consequence of the letter you wrote to me about Varro, I have taken the Academy<sup>1</sup> entirely out of the hands of those distinguished personages, and transferred it to our friend; and from two books I have made it into four. These are longer than the others were, though there are several parts left out. I am very desirous of hearing from you, who understood that he was pleased with my design. I want also to know who it was that you understood excited his envy; unless perhaps it was Brutus. That was the only thing which remained<sup>2</sup>. But yet I should like much to know. In truth, unless my self-love deceive me, those books have come out in such a manner, that there is nothing of the same kind like them even in Greek. You will patiently bear the loss of your copy<sup>3</sup> having been transcribed to no purpose. This, however, will be far more brilliant, more condensed, and better. I am now in doubt which way to turn<sup>4</sup>. I am desirous of gratifying Dolabella's wishes; but can find no proper subject. At the same time "I respect the Trojans"<sup>5</sup>; and if I should find something, I do not see how I can escape reproach. I must either give it up therefore, or I must devise something else. But why do I regard these trifles? How, I beseech you, does my dear Attica, for whom I am very anxious? But I frequently recur to your letter, and feel satisfaction in it; yet I look for further accounts.

<sup>8</sup> The original is from Homer, and has been more than once quoted before. [See book ii. letter 5, and book vii. letter 1.] The meaning is, that he had too much respect for honest citizens to write anything unbecoming the republic.

LETTER XIV.

BRINNIUS's freed-man, my co-heir, wrote to me to say, that, if I pleased, he and Sabinus Albius, two joint heirs, would come to wait upon me. I entirely disapprove of it; the inheritance is not worth it. Besides, they may easily attend the day of the sale, which is the 11th, if they will come to me in Tusculanum on the morning of the 8th, the day after my arrival. Or if they wish to put it off longer, they may do it for two or three days, or as long as they please; for it makes no difference. Therefore unless they are already set out, I would have you stop them. Let me know if there is any news of Brutus; or if you have any intelligence of Cæsar; or if there is anything else. I should wish you to consider again and again whether you approve of sending to Varro what I have written; though there is something also which concerns yourself; for you must know that you are introduced as a third personage in that dialogue<sup>b</sup>. I think then we should consider, notwithstanding the names are already inserted. But they may either be erased or altered.

LETTER XV.

PRAY, how is my Attica? For I have had no letter from you these three days. This is not to be wondered at, as nobody came from Rome, and possibly there was no reason for writing. In consequence I have myself nothing to write about. But the day on which I deliver this to Valerius, I am expecting one of my people, who if he arrives, and brings anything from you, I am persuaded I shall be at no loss what to say.

LETTER XVI.

THOUGH I went in pursuit of streams and solitudes, that I might better be able to support myself, I have hitherto not stirred a foot out of the house; such great and continued rains have we had. I have transferred that whole Academical composition to Varro. It had at first been in the names of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius. Afterwards, as this appeared unsuitable, owing to these persons being, not indeed unlearned, but notoriously unversed in such subjects, as soon as I got home I transferred those dialogues to Cato and Brutus. Your letter about Varro is just arrived. The opinions of Antiochus could be more fitly supported by nobody. Yet I should wish you to inform me, in the first place, whether you think anything should be inscribed to him; then, if you think so, whether this is the properest thing. What of Servilia? Is she yet arrived? Is Brutus doing anything? or when? What is heard of Cæsar? I shall be in Tusculanum on the 7th, as I mentioned<sup>c</sup>. You will settle with Piso<sup>d</sup>, if you can.

LETTER XVII.

ON the 27th I hope to receive something from Rome; not that I had given any particular directions. Therefore, send something by your own people. I must repeat the same inquiries; what Brutus intends? or if he has taken any steps? and whether there is anything from Cæsar? But what are these things? which I care little about: I want to know how my Attica does. Though your letter, which is already too old, bids me hope the best, yet I look for some recent information.

LETTER XVIII.

YOU see the advantage of being near<sup>f</sup>. Let us then conclude the purchase of the gardens<sup>g</sup>. While I was in Tusculanum I seemed to be talking with you; so frequent was the intercourse of our letters. But that will presently be the case again<sup>h</sup>. In the mean time, at your suggestion, I have completed the books to Varro with some acuteness. Still I wait for your answer to what I wrote to you: first, by what means you understood that he wished it of me; since he, who is himself so great a writer, never addressed<sup>i</sup> anything to me: then, who it is that he envied, unless perhaps Brutus<sup>j</sup>. For if he does not envy him, much less Hortensius<sup>k</sup>, or those who speak upon the republic. I wish you distinctly to inform me in the first place, whether you continue in the same mind, that I should send him what I have written, or whether you think there is no occasion for it. But of this when we meet.

LETTER XIX.

MY secretary Hilarus, to whom I had given a letter for you, was just gone on the 28th, when the messenger arrived with your letter dated the day before; in which it was particularly gratifying to me that my Attica begs you not to be uneasy, and that you say there is no danger. Your authority, I see, has famously recommended the Ligarian oration. For Balbus and Oppius wrote to me to say that they were extremely pleased with it, and had in consequence sent it to Cæsar, as you mentioned to me before. In the case of Varro, I am not moved by any apprehension of appearing vainglorious<sup>l</sup>; for I had determined to include no living characters in my dialogues<sup>m</sup>; but since you inform me that Varro is desirous of it, and sets a great value upon it, I have composed this work, and <sup>f</sup> This is probably said in reply to some observation of Atticus.

mpleted the whole Academical discussion in four books; I know not how well, but with such care, that nothing can exceed it. In these, what had been excellently collected by Antiochus against the doctrine of incomprehensibility, I have attributed to Varro; to this I reply in my own person, and I am the third in our conversation. If I had de Cotta and Varro disputing with each other, you suggest in your last letter, mine would be a better character. This has a good effect in old people; as Heraclides has done in several books; and I have six books on Government. I have three books on Oratory, with which I am much satisfied; in these likewise the characters are such, that I came me to be silent. For the speakers are, Cato, Antonius, Catulus the old man, C. Julius Cæsar, Cotta, and Sulpicius. The course is supposed to be held while I was a boy, but it was impossible for me to sustain any part of it. But what I have lately written are in the manner of Aristotle, where the conversation is so managed, that he himself has the principal part. I have finished the five books on the Foundation of Moral Duty, so as to give the Epicurean doctrine to L. Torquatus, the Stoical to M. Cato, the Peripatetic to M. Piso; for I considered that their age and dead would preclude all jealousy. These are my friends, as you know, I had discussed in the persons of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius; but with the subject did not suit their characters; I thought more logical than what they could be supposed ever to have dreamed of. Therefore, when I read your letter about Varro, I seized it as an opportunity. Nothing could be more adapted to the species of philosophy, in which he seems to take particular delight; or to the support of such a character, that I could manage to avoid making my own opinions predominant. For the opinions of Antiochus are extremely persuasive, and are so fully expressed, as to retain the acuteness of Antiochus, with my own brilliancy of language, if I possess any. But consider again and again whether you think these books ought to be attributed to Varro. Some things occur to me upon this subject; but these when we meet.

LETTER XX.

I HAVE received from Cæsar a letter of condolence, dated April 30th, from Seville. I have not yet seen what has been promulgated about extending citizenship; and should be glad to know. I am glad that my services are kindly received by Cæsar, and shall not fail to increase them. It is possible for me now to add to my Ligarian nothing about Tubero's wife and daughter; for the speech has been widely disseminated; nor have I any wish to defend Tubero, who is wonderfully fond of accusing people. You have given me a very fine exhibition. Though I am very satisfied with this place, yet I am desirous to see you, and shall accordingly return, as I intend. I imagine you have had a meeting with my friends; and I want therefore to know what you have done. I am in no trouble about my reputation, whatever I may foolishly have written to you at that time. There is nothing better (for there is no other just object of care) than this; that everybody through his whole life should not deviate a hair's breadth from a right conscience. Observe how philosophically I talk. Do you suppose I am engaged in these speculations to no purpose? I should be sorry to have you vexed; for it was nothing. And, to return again to the same point, do you think that I have altogether any other care than that I may not be deficient towards him? Or is this my object forsooth, that I may appear to preserve the public opinion? "For on these things there is no dependence." I wish I were able to bear my domestic troubles as easily as I can disregard these. But you suppose me to have wished something which has not been accomplished. Is it not allowable, then, to have one's own opinion? But, however, what was then done? I cannot help approving; and yet I can very well lay aside all care about it, as indeed I do. But more than enough of trifles.

LETTER XXI.

I DELIVERED a long letter to Hirtius, which I had just written in Tusculanum. To that, which you sent me there, I shall reply at some other time; at present I wish to advert to others. What can I say about Torquatus, till I have heard something from Dolabella? As soon as that happens, you shall immediately know. I expect a messenger from him to-day, or at farthest to-morrow, who shall be sent on to you as soon as he arrives. I am expecting to hear from Quintus; for when I was setting out from Tusculanum on the 24th, as you know, I sent a messenger to him. To return to my business; that expression of yours, which had wonderfully pleased me, now exceedingly displeases; for it is altogether a nautical term, as indeed I knew; but I thought that when the rowers were ordered inhibere, "to back their oars," they suspended their motion. Yesterday, however, upon the arrival of a vessel at my villa*, I learnt that this was not the case; for they do not suspend them, but move them in another manner. This is quite different from the Greek ἑκτρέχειν. Therefore * Towards reconciling Cicero and Quintus. See the ninth and following letters of book xi.

† So I understand this passage, which has been variously interpreted by different commentators.

‡ I conceive this alludes to some expression fallen from Atticus, probably on the occasion of Quintus Cicero.

§ This seems to be written under a sense of philosophical propriety, by which he was taught to be anxious about nothing but his own conduct.

|| In the original is a fragment only of a Greek sentence, which, in our ignorance of the remainder, must be supplied by conjecture.

¶ Meaning, no doubt, his affliction for his daughter, as well as his concern about Terentia and Quintus.

⌘ Respecting his conduct towards his brother, who seemed to take offence at Cicero's advancing money to Pompeius, while he suffered Quintus to remain in difficulties. [See book xi. letter 13.] I am aware that the latter part of this letter has been very differently interpreted, and supposed by some able commentators to relate to Cicero's success in the forum, for which I see no sufficient grounds.

let it stand in the book, as it was. Mention this also to Varro, unless he has already altered it. For there is no better word than I had used before, and which is warranted by the authority of Lucullus. Carneades also makes the guard of the boxer, and the action of the charioteer holding in his horses, to correspond with ἀνείη; but the backing the oars is attended with motion, and that a considerable one, while the ship is turned round to the stern. You see how much more I care about this, than either about public rumour<sup>7</sup>; or about Pollio<sup>8</sup>: let me hear also about Pansa<sup>9</sup>, if anything certain is known; for I imagine it has been made public; and if there has been any news of Critonius, or anything ascertained respecting Metellus and Balbinus. Tell me, is it your pleasure to publish my writings first, without my leave? Not even Hermodorus did this, who used to divulge Plato's books; from whence came the proverb, "Hermodorus deals in words<sup>10</sup>." How is this? Do you think it right that anybody should have it before Brutus, whom I addressed at your suggestion<sup>11</sup>. For Balbus wrote me word that he had transcribed the fifth book of the Foundations of Moral Duty from you; in which I have not indeed altered much; yet something. But you will do well to keep back the others; that Balbus may not receive them uncorrected, or Brutus when they are stale. But enough of these matters, that I may not seem to be diligent about trifles. Though now these things are the greatest with which I have to do. For what else is there? I am using such despatch in sending to Varro what I have written at your suggestion, as already to have forwarded it to Rome to be transcribed. You may, if you please, have it immediately; for I have written to my clerks to let yours, if you wished it, have the liberty of copying it; but you will keep it private till I see you; as you always do with great care, when I have desired it. But in consequence of my having omitted to mention this to you, Caecilia, glowing with a wonderful passion for philosophy, copies from your people, and is in the possession of these same books on the Foundations of Moral Duty. And I assure you (subject indeed to human fallibility) that she did not receive them from my people; for they were never out of my sight; and they were, besides, so far from making two copies, that it was with difficulty they completed one. I do not however impute any fault to your clerks: and that I would have you understand; for I had omitted to say that I did not yet wish them to get abroad. What! still upon trifles? For upon subjects of importance I have nothing to say. I agree with you about Dolabella. Let the co-heirs<sup>12</sup>, as you mention, come to Tusculanum. Balbus has written to me about Cæsar's arrival, that it will not be before the 1st of August. The account of Attica is excellent, that she has less fever, is quieter, and bears her illness with patience. As to what you say upon that subject for our consideration<sup>13</sup>, in which I take no less interest than you; so far as I know, I greatly approve of the gentleman, his family, and fortune. What else all is the chief thing, I am not personally acquainted with him; but I hear favourable reports from Scrofa. He likewise lives very near you, if this is anything to the purpose; and is none noble<sup>14</sup> than his father. When we meet therefore—and it will be with a mind disposed to approve. For in addition to what I have said, I have a regard for his father, as I believe you know, and greater than not only you, but than he is aware of; and that, both deservedly, and of long standing.

LETTER XXII.

It is not without reason that I ask so particularly what you think best about Varro. Some things occur to me, which I shall reserve till we meet. I have been very glad to interweave your name, which I shall do frequently; for it was by your last letter that I first understood you did not object to it. About Marcellus<sup>15</sup> I had before heard from Cassius; and Serrius sent me the particulars. What a sad affair! To come back to my first subject; there is no place, where I would rather have my writings remain, than with you. But I should like not to have them sent abroad, till we both approve of it. I exempt your clerks from all blame, and do not mean to find fault with you; notwithstanding what I wrote to you, that Caecilia had some, which she could only have had from you. I was aware of the propriety of gratifying Balbus<sup>16</sup>; I only wished that it might not be given to Brutus when it was grown stale, or to Balbus when it was imperfect. I will send the books to Varro, if you think it right, as soon as I have seen you. You shall know the cause of my hesitation when we meet. In calling upon the assignees, you have done quite right. I am sorry you should have so much trouble about your grandmother's estate. The case of our friend Brutus is very vexatious; but it is the condition of human life. The ladies<sup>17</sup> are a little unreasonable in bearing such hostile dispositions, while neither of them are chargeable with dereliction of their duty. There was no occasion to call upon my secretary Tullius. If there had been, I would have sent you word. For nothing has been deposited with him under the title of a vow<sup>18</sup>; though he has some money belonging to me, which I have determined to apply to this purpose. So that both I told you rightly where it was; and he rightly denied having anything under that title. But let us at once enter upon this business<sup>19</sup>. For the consecration of men<sup>20</sup>, I do not approve of a grove, because it is too unfrequented; notwithstanding it has a reputation of civility. But this also shall be as you think proper for you are my guide in everything. I shall to Tusculum, as I appointed<sup>a</sup>; and I wish could be there the same day. But if anything should prevent you (as many things may), at least next day, when the co-heirs are to come, by which it would be cruel to be beset without you. In another letter without a word about Attica; his I place among the best signs. I find fault with this; not that you, but that she should not wish to send her compliments. But do you send me my very best compliments both to her, and to her father; do not however give a hint of my being neglected. I send Cæsar's letter, in case you should care to read it.

LETTER XXIII.

The letter which I received from you yesterday in the forenoon, I immediately replied; I now send you that of the afternoon. I wish Brutus had sent for me; which was more reasonable, considering the sudden and distant journey upon which he was going<sup>a</sup>; and, to say the truth, under such circumstances, when we are incapable of enjoining each other's society (for you know in what consists the pleasure of living together) I should readily have acceded to our meeting in Tusculum rather than in Tusculanum. The books were no impediment; for they have been so long, as you have seen; they only wait to be errors of the clerks corrected. You know the situation about these books; but you are sensible. Those which I am to send to Brutus, are now in the hands of the transcribers. Get business settled, as you mention; though Trebatius tells me they all make those deductions. Do you think these people will do it? You are acquainted with the house.* Conclude it with facility. You cannot believe how much regard such concerns. I assure you in the plainest manner, and would have you believe that my paltry possessions are more plague and care to me; and that I am more disabled by having nobody upon whom I should rely, than gratified by having them to assist me. Trebatius also said that he had mentioned the circumstance to you. But perhaps you were surprised to hear it. That indeed I intended; but, believe me, I do not care about such matters. Therefore enter into my plan, and clip it as you will, and make an extract. Rouse them, call, speak to them, as if you were speaking with that Scæva.

LETTER XXIV.

WHAT is this which I hear from Hermogenes Clodius, that Andromenes had told him he had seen Cicero<sup>a</sup> at Corcyra? For I suppose it must have been known to you<sup>b</sup>. Has he then sent no letter even by him? Or has he not seen him? Let me know how this is. What more should I say to you about Varro? The four books are in your possession, and I shall be satisfied with whatever you do. I am restrained by no "respect for the Trojans"; why should I? I was rather afraid how well he might himself<sup>c</sup> like it. But since you undertake it, I shall rest at ease.

LETTER XXV.

RESPECTING the deductions<sup>a</sup> I have already replied to your very accurate letter. You will make an end of it therefore, and without any hesitation, or revision. It is proper and expedient that this should be done. About Andromenes<sup>b</sup>, I had supposed it must be as you say, otherwise you would have known it, and mentioned it to me. While you write so much about Brutus, you say nothing of yourself<sup>c</sup>. But when do you suppose he will come to Tusculanum? For on the 14th I am going to Rome. What I meant to say to Brutus (but what I perhaps expressed indistinctly, since you mention your having read it) was, that I had understood from your letter, that he wished me not to go up at this time merely for the sake of waiting upon him. But as the appointed time of my going<sup>d</sup> is so near, I beg that you will take care that this may be no impediment to his coming to Tusculanum for his own convenience. For I had no intention of calling upon him about the sale, since you alone are quite sufficient in a business of that kind. But I wanted him to attest my will<sup>e</sup>; which I should now prefer executing at another time, that I may not seem to have come to Rome for that purpose<sup>f</sup>. I have accordingly written to Brutus, what I really thought, that there was no occasion for his being there on the 15th<sup>a</sup>. I should be glad then if you would manage this whole business so, that I may not in the least interfere with Brutus's convenience. But what is it that you are at length afraid of, because I desire the books to be given to Varro on your responsibility? Even now, if you have any doubt, let me know it. In elegance of style they have not been surpassed. I should like Varro, especially as he desires it; but he is, as you know, "a stern man, and one who might easily take exception without just cause<sup>b</sup>." Accordingly I often picture to myself his countenance, complaining, it may be, that my part is more copiously defended in those books than his; though you will perceive that this is not the case, if ever you get into Epirus, and have leisure to examine them. For at present I give way to your correspondence with Alexio<sup>c</sup>. I do not however despair of their meeting with Varro's approbation; and after being at the expense of large paper<sup>d</sup>, I shall not be sorry to have that design adhered to. But I say again and again, that it must be on your responsibility. Therefore if you have any hesitation, let us transfer it to Brutus; for he also is an Antiochian<sup>e</sup>. O variable Academy, and like itself; now here, now there<sup>f</sup>. But, pray how did you like my letter to Varro? May I die, if I ever study any work, as I have done this. I have not even dictated to Tiro, who is used to write down whole sentences; but to Spintherus, syllable by syllable.

[N.B. The 36th letter was before inserted in its proper place, after the 43d of book xii.]

LETTER XXVII.

RESPECTING the letter to Cæsar<sup>1</sup>, I was always of opinion that it ought first to be submitted to his friends. Otherwise I should have been not only wanting in attention to them, but should also have exposed myself to some danger, in case of his being offended with me. They have acted ingenuously; and I take it kindly that they have not concealed what they thought. Especially they have done well in suggesting so many alterations, that the writing it afresh is more than the occasion demands. On the subject of the Parthian war, however, what ought I to have considered, but what I supposed him to wish? For what other argument could my letter admit, besides flattery? Had I wished to recommend what I thought best, should I have wanted matter? Therefore the whole letter is unnecessary. For where the advantage to be gained cannot be great; and a failure, even if it be not great, may be productive of vexation; what need is there of running the risk? Especially when I consider, that having written nothing before, he would expect that I should write nothing till the whole war was at an end. I am even apprehensive that he may imagine I wished this to be as a soother for my "Cato." In short, I repented of having written, and nothing could fall out more to my mind, than that my labour was not approved. Besides, I should have exposed myself to the calumnies of Cæsar's adherents, and among them to those of your relation<sup>m</sup>. But I return<sup>n</sup> to the subject of the gardens. I would by no means have you go thither but with perfect convenience to yourself; for there is no hurry. Whatever be the result, let us use our endeavours about Faberius. Respecting the day of sale, however, when you know anything, you will inform me. As the messenger, who came from Cumani, reports that Attica is quite well, and says that he has a letter for you, I send him on to you without delay.

<sup>f</sup> He compares his own variableness in changing the address, to the variable nature of the Academic philosophy, which he professed, ever bending to circumstances, and adopting probability in the place of fixed principles.

LETTER XXVIII.

As you were to inspect the gardens to-day, I shall hear to-morrow what you have thought of them. About Faberius you will let me know, when he is arrived. Respecting the letter to Cæsar, believe me when I swear that I cannot do it. Not that the baseness of it deters me; (though it ought exceedingly; for how base is flattery?) since it is base for me even to be alive. But, as I was saying, it is not this baseness that deters me; I wish it was; for I should then be what I ought to be: but nothing occurs to my mind. For with regard to the exhortations of those eloquent and learned men<sup>o</sup> to Alexander, you see on what subjects they are employed. They are addressed to a young man inflamed with the love of the transient glory, and asking for advice in the pursuit of lasting praise. It is easy to speak in an honourable cause. But what can I do? Yet I carved out from my wooden materials something that might look like an image; and in this, because there were some things a little better than what are doing, and have been done, they are censured. But I by no means regret this; for if that letter had been delivered, believe me, I should be sorry for it. What? Do not you see how that very disciple of Aristotle, with all his understanding and all his moderation, after he got the title of king, became haughty, cruel, intemperate? And do you suppose this man<sup>p</sup> from amidst his processions, the comrade of Quirinus<sup>q</sup>, will be pleased with this temperate letter of mine? But let him rather want what is not written than disapprove what is written. In short, as he pleases. That medean problem', which once stimulated me, which I referred to you, is past. Now, indeed, for that issue or any issue<sup>a</sup>, much more than I formerly dreaded it. Unless some else prevent you, I shall be very glad to see ere. Nicias has been earnestly sent for by Sulla, for I read the letter; and though it was to my inclination, yet it was at my instance went. This in my own hand.

LETTER XXIX.

As I was inquiring of Nicias different relating to literary people, I fell, as it were, once upon the subject of Talna<sup>a</sup>. He made account of his abilities, but said that he modest and prudent. He added, however, did not like, that he said he knew he had said his addresses to Cornificia, the daughter of Nicias<sup>b</sup>, who was an old woman, and had married several times; but the match was approved by the ladies, who found out that his property did not exceed 800 sesteria (6400*l.*). I have thought it right you should know. I learned about the gardens, both from your son from Chrysippus<sup>c</sup>. In the house, with the loss of which I was well acquainted, I said there has been little or no alteration. For, he speaks well of the larger bath, and at the out of the smaller may be constructed into apartments<sup>d</sup>. A covered place for the garden must therefore be added; which, if it is as large as that in Tusculanum, will not cost more than half the price, in this place. But the temple which I want, nothing seems more suitable than the grove with which I was formerly acquainted; but at that time it was little used; now I hear it is very much so: therefore I think that I should prefer to it. On this I entreat you to bear with my extravagance. Now, that if Faberius pays me that debt, I do not have you make a question about the debt, which would have you outbid Otho. At the same time I do not suppose he will exceed the debt of reason; for I think I know the man. For he has been so roughly<sup>e</sup> treated, that I think he will care to be a purchaser. What? suffer?—But why do I reason about it? I settle this Faberian account, let me have it at a dear rate: if not, I must not think of a cheap one. Let us try Clodia there, whom I entertain hope, both on account of being much cheaper, and because Dol-probably means the embarrassment in which he fell upon his return to Italy after the defeat of which he speaks so much in book xi., when what steps he ought to take to conciliate Caesar, and the effects of his displeasure.

Life, or death, now appears more desirable to me of sorrow and dissatisfaction, after the loss of liberty, and loss of the freedom of the state.

bella's debt<sup>f</sup> is on the point of being liquidated, so that I may trust to paying in ready money. Enough about the gardens. To-morrow I hope to see you, unless some business prevent; which I wish may be Faberius's. However, if you can.

LETTER XXX.

I RETURN you Cicero's<sup>g</sup> letter. O hard-hearted man, who are not moved with his dangers<sup>h</sup>! He accuses me also. I should have sent you his letter; for as to the other respecting his achievements, I take it to be a copy of yours. I have sent a messenger to Cumanum to-day, to whom I have entrusted your letter to Vestorius, which was brought by Pharnaces. I had just despatched Demea to you, when Eros arrived. But there was no news in the letter he brought, excepting that the sale<sup>i</sup> would be in two days. Therefore after that<sup>j</sup>, as you mention; and I wish the Faberian business may previously have been settled. Eros, says he<sup>k</sup>, will not come to-day; but thinks he may to-morrow morning. You must pay him attention; though such flattery is not far removed from guilt. I shall hope to see you the day after to-morrow. Find out, if you can, who were the ten commissioners sent to Mummius<sup>l</sup>. Polybius does not mention their names. I remember only the consular Albinus, and Sp. Mummius, and think I have heard Hortensius name Tuditannus. But in Libo's annals it appears that Tuditannus was made praetor fourteen years after Mummius's consulship; which does not accord. I think of writing some political congress, supposed to be held at Olympia, or where you will, after the manner of your friend Dicaearchus.

LETTER XXXI.

On the morning of the 28th I received by Demea<sup>a</sup> a letter dated the day before, by which I might expect you either to-day or to-morrow. But I apprehend that longing, as I do, for your arrival, I shall myself be the occasion of stopping you. For I cannot suppose the Faberian business will be so soon despatched (even if it is in train) but that it will meet with some impediment. When you are at liberty therefore<sup>b</sup>; as you are still likely to be kept. I shall be glad if you will send me the books of Dicaearchus, which you mention, and likewise his κατάβασις<sup>c</sup>. About the letter to

<sup>a</sup> It appears by the preceding letter that Cicero had sent this Demea before to Atticus, and it is to be supposed that he brought back a letter from Atticus to Cicero, which is that spoken of. The expression of the text is liable to the same ambiguity as that in the translation.

<sup>b</sup> The sense is obvious, that he wished Atticus to come to him as soon as he was at liberty. I have thought the conclusion of the sentence was sufficiently clear, without adding to the original.

<sup>c</sup> Meaning his book upon the descent into Trophonius's cave, which was before mentioned. See book vi. letter 2.

Cæsar I am quite determined. And the very thing which they say he mentions in his letter, that he will not go against the Parthians till affairs at home are settled, is the same that I advised in my letter. But were it otherwise, whichever he chose to do, he might, with my consent. For does he wait for this forsooth? And will he do nothing but by my advice? Let us, I beseech you, have done with this, and be at least half-free; which we may yet be by saying nothing, and keeping quiet. But speak to Otho, as you propose; and make an end, my Atticus, of that business<sup>1</sup>. For I can find no other place where I can be with you, and yet not be in the forum. With regard to the price, this has occurred to me. C. Albanus is the nearest neighbour; who bought of M. Pilius 1000 acres, as well as I remember, for 11,500 sesteria<sup>2</sup> (92,000*l.*); and everything is now lower. But my wishes are to be taken into the account; in which I am likely to have no rival besides Otho. Even upon him you will be able to make some impression; and the easier, if you have the assistance of Canus<sup>3</sup>. O silly gluttony!! Let him suppose that I maintain the sternness of a father<sup>4</sup>. You will reply to his letter, if there is anything you wish to say.

LETTER XXXII.

HAVING received a second letter from you to-day, I did not care to leave you with only one in return. Do as you mention in regard to Faberius; for on him depends the whole success of my design. Had not this design been in agitation, (believe me in this, as in everything else,) I should not trouble myself. Therefore, as you do (for nothing can exceed this) urge, insist, accomplish. I should be glad if you would send me both books of Dicaearchus on the Soul, and likewise that on the Descent<sup>5</sup>. I do not find his Tripoliteicon, or the letter which he sent to Aristoxenus. I now particularly want those<sup>6</sup> three books; they would be convenient for the subject<sup>7</sup> which I have in contemplation. The "Torquatus"<sup>8</sup> is at Rome: I have desired it may be sent to you. The "Catulus" and "Lucullus"<sup>9</sup> I imagine you have had before; but I have made new introductions to these books, which I wish you to have, containing an eulogium upon each of these persons; and there are some other additions. You have not quite understood what I wrote to you about the ten commissioners; which I suppose was owing to my writing by abbreviations. For I meant to inquire about C. Tudinus, who I heard from Hortensius had been one of the ten. But in Libo's annals I see that he was prætor in the consulship of P. Popilius and P. Rapius. Could he then have been a commissioner fourteen years before he was prætor? Unless indeed he became quæstor extremely late, which I do not think was the case; for I observe that he had no difficulty in taking the curule<sup>1</sup> offices at the regular times. I knew that Posthumus was one of them, whose statue you say you remember at the Isthmus. It is he who was with Lucullus; for whom I have to thank you, as a very proper personage at that congress<sup>2</sup>. You will find out then the others if you can; that I may have a splendid assemblage of characters.

LETTER XXXIII.

STRANGE negligence! Can you suppose that Balbus and Faberius had ever once told me the declaration<sup>3</sup> was given in? Moreover, it was by their direction that I sent up on purpose to make my declaration, which they said it was proper to do. It was made by the freed-man Philotimus. I believe you are acquainted with the clerk<sup>4</sup>: but you will write to him, and that without delay. I have sent a letter to Faberius, as you advise; and imagine you will have had some communication with Balbus to-day in the capitol. I have no scruple in regard to Virgilius<sup>5</sup>. I have no reason for it on his own account; and if I should purchase, of what will he have to complain? But you must take care, that, being in Africa, he does not act the same part as Cælius<sup>6</sup>. You will see about the account with Crispinus<sup>7</sup>. But if Plancus thinks of it<sup>8</sup>, there may be some difficulty. You and I are both of us desirous that you should come to me; but this business must not be left. This is indeed good news, that you hope Otho may be gained<sup>9</sup>. Respecting the valuation, as you say, when we have entered upon the negotiation; though his letter only relates to the quantity of land. Conclude with Piso<sup>10</sup> if you can. I have received Dicaearchus's book, and expect the κατάβασις. Give instructions to somebody about the commis-

Your conjecture about Tuditanus is very probable; that, as at Corinth, (for Hortensius did not mention it inconsiderately,) he was then either quaestor military tribune; and I rather suppose this to be the case. You will be able to ascertain from Antiochus. Learn also in what year he quaestor, or military tribune. If neither, then, whether he was in the number of eutenants or of the pages<sup>d</sup>; provided he was at war at all. I was speaking of Varro, and of the wolf in the fable<sup>e</sup>. For he came to me at such a time, that I invited him to stay; did not use so much violence as to tear his hair; for I remember that expression of yours; they were a large company, and I was not red. Nevertheless, soon after came C. C. with T. Carinas. Their coats I scarcely shed<sup>f</sup>; yet they stayed, and it fell out very well. But Capito, by chance, entered upon the subject of enlarging the city<sup>g</sup>; that the Tiber was brought from the Mulvian bridge at the foot of the Vatican hills; that the Campus Martius be built up, and the Vatican plain be added into another Campus Martius. "What say?" cried I. "I am going to the auction, if I can with propriety, I may purchase your gardens." "Take care how you do this," he; "for the law will certainly be carried; it is Caesar's wish." I heard him very willingly, but should be sorry to have it take place. What say you? You know Capito's diligence in getting out news. He is not inferior to Camille; let me hear about the business of the 15th<sup>h</sup>; that which brings me up. I had likewise heard of his affairs, which, however, I can easily learn two or three days later. But I by no means wish you to be harassed with travelling. I give Dionysius. As to what you say about I have set him quite at liberty, as far as concerns me; for I wrote to him yesterday to say I had no occasion for his assistance on the

For I have already written to you on the subject of the gardens.

LETTER XXXV.

O DISGRACEFUL circumstance! Your namesake<sup>c</sup> is enlarging the city, which he never saw till within these two years, and which he thinks too little even to hold him. I expect to hear from you upon this subject. You say that you will present the books<sup>d</sup> to Varro as soon as he arrives. He has got them then by this time, and all doubt is at an end. Ah! if you could know what risk you run<sup>e</sup>! unless my letter has perhaps stopped you. But you had not received it when you wrote last. I am anxious to know therefore how the affair stands.

LETTER XXXVI.

THOUGH what you tell me of Brutus's affection, and your walk together, is nothing new, but the very same that I have often heard before; yet the oftener, the more agreeable. And it is the more gratifying to me, because you take pleasure in it; and the more certain because it comes from you.

LETTER XXXVII.

I SEND you this second letter to-day. Nothing can be more convenient or more suitable than what you mention about Xeno's debt, and the forty sestertia (300*l.*) from Epirus<sup>a</sup>. The younger Balbus spoke of that business<sup>b</sup> to me in the same manner. There is nothing new, but that Hirtius disputed sharply with Quintus<sup>c</sup> in my behalf; while he<sup>d</sup> continued everywhere, and especially in company, to utter many calumnies first about me, then about his own father. But nothing of what he said was so plausible, as that we were both exceedingly hostile towards Caesar; that we were not to be trusted; and that I was even to be guarded against. It was quite formidable; but that I knew our king was aware of my having no spirit left. He said

too that I was severe towards my son Cicero; but of that as he pleases. I am glad I gave to Lepta's messenger my panegyric on Porcia<sup>a</sup> before I received your letter. You will take care, therefore, if you have any regard for me, that if it is sent to Domitius and Brutus, it may be sent in this form<sup>b</sup>. You will continue to give me daily information about the gladiators<sup>c</sup>, and other subjects that are blown about, as you call it. I should be glad, if you think well of it, that you would call upon Balbus and Offilius about advertising the sale<sup>d</sup>. I spake to Balbus myself, who agreed to it. I imagine Offilius has a written account of all the property. Balbus has also. But Balbus wished for an early day, and at Rome; if Caesar's arrival should be delayed, the day might be put off. But he seems to be just here. Therefore take the whole into consideration; for Vestorius has signified his acquiescence<sup>e</sup>.

LETTER XXXVIII.

As I was writing before dawn against the Epicureans<sup>a</sup>, by the same lamp and labour<sup>b</sup> I scrawled something to you, and sent it before it was light. Afterwards, having slept again, when I got up at sun-rise I received a letter from your sister's son<sup>c</sup>, which I send you. The beginning of it is very reproachful; but perhaps "he did it without consideration."<sup>d</sup> It runs thus: "I am sorry for everything that can be said discredibly of you." Meaning that many things might be said against me, though he professed not to approve it. Can anything be more foul? But you shall read the rest, and judge for yourself; for I inclose it to you. You mentioned sometime since, that he was struck with the daily and continual commendations of our friend Brutus, such as many persons have told me he bestows upon me. He<sup>e</sup> has said something about it to me, and I imagine to you, which you will let me know. What he may have written to his father about me, I cannot tell. But observe how dutifully he speaks of his mother: "In order," says he, "that I might be with you<sup>f</sup> as much as possible, I wished to have a house hired for me, and so I told you; but you have not done it, so that we shall be less together. For I cannot bear to see that house; you know why." The reason <sup>a</sup> Cato's sister, who had lately died. She was mother to Domitius. See letter 48 of this book, which should have preceded this.

<sup>f</sup> The 2d book of his Tusculan Questions, on which he was at this time engaged.

<sup>g</sup> Writing before it was light, he of course wrote by a lamp. The expression "lamp and labour" was familiar to the Romans; and though not so in English, it seemed desirable nevertheless to preserve it in the translation.

his father gives, is his aversion to his mother. Now help me, my Atticus, with your advice. "Shall I mount the lofty wall of justice<sup>a</sup>?" that is, shall I openly spurn him, and cast him off? "Or shall I use the crooked paths of dissimulation?" For I may add with Pindar—"to say the truth, my mind is divided." The former is more suitable to my disposition; but perhaps the latter to the times. Whatever be your opinion, be assured that mine is the same. I am most apprehensive of his intruding upon me in Tusculanum. It would be easier managed in a greater concourse. Shall I remove then to Astura? What if Caesar should suddenly arrive? Help me, I beseech you, with your advice. I will do as you determine.

LETTER XXXIX.

O VANITY beyond belief!! To tell his father that he must absent himself from home on account of his mother! How dutiful! But his father already relaxes, and says that his son had reason to be angry with him. I will, however, follow your advice; for I see you prefer the crooked<sup>a</sup>. I will go to Rome, as you recommend, though against my inclination; for I am deeply engaged in writing. By the same opportunity, you say I shall see Brutus. But were it not for that other reason<sup>b</sup>, this circumstance<sup>c</sup> would not bring me up: for he does not come from whence I could wish<sup>d</sup>; nor has he been long absent, or ever written to me. But yet I want to know how his journey has turned out<sup>e</sup>. I should be glad if you would send me the books which I before mentioned to you, especially those of Phædrus, entitled Nepotus and Exiles<sup>f</sup>.

LETTER XL.

Does Brutus say this, that Caesar brings good tidings to worthy people? But where will he find them? Unless perhaps he hangs himself<sup>a</sup>. But here what support he meets with! Where then is that device of yours, which I saw in the Parthenon<sup>b</sup>,

<sup>i</sup> Commentators are not agreed about the text, and it is in vain to conjecture what these books might be.

<sup>j</sup> This may probably allude to something previously said by Atticus. It appears to be meant of Caesar, who having occasioned the death of so many good citizens, could only find in the regions of the dead any deserving that name.

<sup>k</sup> It seems most probable that this may mean some library, or gallery, belonging to Brutus, so called from the temple at Athens, and in which he might, by the advice of Atticus, have placed statues, or pictures, of his ancestors Brutus and Aulus, the assertors of their country's liberty, the first against Tarquinius, the second against Q. Metellus.

ala and Brutus? But what can he do? I eased with what follows<sup>a</sup>, that not even he<sup>b</sup>, has been the source of all our atrocities, thinks of our nephew. I had feared that even Brutus might entertain affection for him: for so he stood in the letter he wrote in reply to mine. He<sup>c</sup> had tasted some of his<sup>d</sup> stories. But, I say, when we meet. Yet what do you<sup>e</sup>? that I should go up? or stay? To say truth, I am both entangled in my books, and unwilling to receive him<sup>f</sup> here. I understand his<sup>g</sup> is gone to-day to meet him at the Acronocks<sup>h</sup>. It is surprising how angry he went; I was obliged to check him. But I am easily changed. Therefore I must hereafter are how I conduct myself<sup>i</sup>. But consider you think of my going up; and, if it can rely seen to-morrow, let me be informed of going early in the morning<sup>j</sup>.

LETTER XLI.

WE sent to Quintus the letter for your. Upon his complaining of the quarrel of young Quintus and his mother, (on which he told his son that he would remove from<sup>k</sup>.) I mentioned that he had written a very letter to his mother, but none to you. He prized at the first circumstance; but with you, he said the fault rested with him. He had repeatedly written to his son of severity respecting your unkindness to him. But upon his saying that he relented, I (after reading your letter recommending simulation) that I should not be angry with or then came on the mention of Cana<sup>l</sup>. I said, if that proposal should be adopted, it<sup>m</sup> necessary. But, as you observe, some must be paid to our own dignity; and it both to be in the same mind, though his towards me is the greater and more notorious. Brutus brings anything conciliatory, we hesitate. When we meet, however: for ing of some moment, and requires caution. Now therefore<sup>n</sup>, unless I receive from you other leave<sup>o</sup> of absence.

Cicero's letter.

<sup>d</sup> conceive the sentence ought to be completed; that he must be careful how he reproached his whom he might soon after have occasion to in the present instance.

<sup>e</sup> on the day after to-morrow. He wanted to in Atticus an early account of everything relating to his approach, that he might regulate his accordingly.

LETTER XLII.

HE<sup>a</sup> came to me, and was very much dejected; upon which I said, but what makes you so thoughtful? Do you ask, says he, one who has a journey to perform; and a journey to the war, and that a dangerous and a disagreeable one<sup>b</sup>? What then obliges you to go? said I. My debts, he replied; and yet I have not even enough to support me on the road. In this place I borrowed something from your eloquence, and held my tongue. But, he went on to say, I am most of all vexed about my uncle. On what account? said I. Because, says he, he is angry with me. Why do you suffer it? I said. (For I chose rather to say so, than, why do you give occasion for it?) I will not suffer it, says he; for I will remove the cause of it. You do rightly, said I; but if it is not troublesome, I should be glad to know what the cause may be. Because, whilst I was deliberating whom I should marry, I did not satisfy my mother, and so did not satisfy him. But at present there is nothing I so much wish<sup>c</sup>, and am ready to do what they desire. I hope it will turn out well, said I, and I commend you. But how soon? I am indifferent about the time, said he, since I approve of the thing. But I think, said I, that it should be before you set out; for so you will give satisfaction also to your father. I will do, says he, as you advise. So ended this dialogue. But mark you: you recollect that my birth-day is the 3d of January; you will accordingly be with me. Just as I had finished my letter, see here, Lepidus begs me to come up. I imagine the augurs have nothing to do in the way of consecrating a temple. But let us go<sup>d</sup>. I shall therefore see you.

LETTER XLIII.

I SHALL certainly avail myself of this delay of a day; and you have done very kindly to let me know it, and in such a manner as to write yourself immediately from the sports, and to let me get your letter at a time when I did not expect it. I have indeed some business to transact in Rome, but I can do it two days later.

LETTER XLIV.

YOUR letter was most pleasing, however unpleasant the circumstance of the procession<sup>a</sup>. But yet it is not unpleasant to know everything, even that affair of Cotta<sup>b</sup>. The populace indeed behaved

<sup>e</sup> The procession here spoken of seems to have been that called Circensian, exhibited in the Circus Maximus, where the images of the gods were drawn along with great pomp previously to the exhibition of the games. On this occasion Caesar's image was also drawn next to that of Victory, by an adulatory decree of the senate.

<sup>f</sup> It is supposed that Cotta, even at this time, began to speak of making Crassus a king, on pretence of some obscure prophecy that the Parthians could only be conquered by a king.

nobly in giving no applause even to the statue of Victory, on account of its bad neighbour<sup>m</sup>. Brutus has been with me, and wished me very much to write something to Cæsar; to which I agreed; but on condition that he would see the procession<sup>n</sup>. And have you ventured to present the books to Varro<sup>o</sup>? I am anxious to know what he may think of them. But when will he read them? I quite approve of your conduct about Attica<sup>p</sup>. It is something to have the mind elevated with the sight, as well as with the awe and celebrity, of the ceremony. I should be glad if you would send me Cotta<sup>q</sup>. Libo I have with me, and I had Casca before. Brutus has informed me upon the authority of T. Ligarius, that the naming of L. Curfidius in the Ligarian speech is my mistake; but, as they say, an error of memory. I knew that Curfidius was very intimate with the family of Ligarius; but I see that he had died previously. Therefore give instructions to Pharnaces, Antæus, and Salvius<sup>r</sup>, to erase that name from all the copies.

LETTER XLV.

LAMIA was with me after you left me; and he brought me a letter he had received from Cæsar, which, though it was dated antecedently to those brought by Diochares<sup>s</sup>, yet plainly declared his intention of coming before the Roman games<sup>t</sup>. At the end of it he desired that Lamia<sup>u</sup> would make every preparation for the games, so that he might not hurry up to no purpose. By this letter there seemed to be no doubt of his arriving before that time; and Lamia said that Balbus upon reading that letter was of the same opinion. I find I have some additional holidays<sup>v</sup>; but how many, do, if you love me, let me know. You will be able to learn from Bæbius, or from your other neighbour Egnatius. When you exhort me to employ those days in expounding philosophy, you urge one who is already running. But you perceive that I must spend that time with Dolabella. Were I not detained by Torquatus's business<sup>w</sup>, I should be able to run down to Puteoli<sup>x</sup>, and return in time. Lamia, it seems, had heard from Balbus that there was a large sum of money in the house<sup>y</sup>, which ought to be divided as soon as possible; and a great

<sup>q</sup> Cotta, Libo, and Casca, here mentioned, seem to mean certain works of which they were respectively the authors, as we say familiarly Locke, or Pope, meaning the books written by them.

<sup>v</sup> That the necessary time of his going to Rome was postponed.

<sup>w</sup> It has appeared by some former letters that Cicero wanted to serve his friend Torquatus through the influence of Dolabella. See letter 9 of this book.

amount of plate, besides the lands; that an auction ought to take place at the earliest time. I wish you would write me word what you think best to be done. For my own part, if I had to choose out of all, I could not easily find anybody more diligent, or more ready, or more friendly towards me, than Vestorius; to whom I have written very particularly, and imagine that you have done the same. This appears to me sufficient. What say you? For the only thing I am afraid of is, that I may seem too negligent. I shall therefore hope to hear from you.

LETTER XLVI.

POLLEX<sup>a</sup> told me he would be back by the 13th of August, and accordingly came to me at Lanuvium the 12th. But he is rightly called Pollex, not Index<sup>b</sup>. You will learn therefore from himself I called upon Balbus: for Lepta, who was anxious about the games<sup>c</sup>, brought me to him by force, in that Lanuvian villa which he has given up to Lepidus. From him the first thing I heard was this—"A little while ago I received that letter, in which he strongly confirms his intention of returning before the Roman games." I read the letter. There is a great deal about my "Cato"<sup>d</sup>, from the repeated perusal of which he says that he is grown more copious; whilst from the reading of Brutus's "Cato"<sup>e</sup> he appears to himself eloquent. From him I learned the inheritance of Cluvius's property. O negligent Vestorius! A free<sup>f</sup> inheritance, before witnesses<sup>g</sup>, within sixty days. I was afraid it would be necessary to send for him<sup>h</sup>. Now I must send to desire he will accept by my order. This same Pollex may therefore return<sup>i</sup>. I have also had some liberal conversation with Balbus about Cluvius's gardens, in which he promised to write to Cæsar immediately. He said that Cluvius had charged Titus Hordeonius with a legacy of 50,000 sesterii (400*l.*) to Terentia, with the expense of a monument, and several other things; but that there was no charge upon me. Pray, gently reprove Vestorius. What can be more discreditable, than that Plotius the perfumer should so long before have informed Balbus of everything by his slaves; and that he<sup>j</sup> should not have informed me even by my own. I am sorry for Cossinius, for I had a great regard for him. If anything should remain after paying my debts and my purchases, I will send it to Quintus; but I apprehend these will oblige me even to contract new ones. I know nothing about the house at Arpinum.

<sup>a</sup> This appears to have been one of Cicero's messengers [see book xi. letter 4]; perhaps the same who, in book viii. letter 6, is called Pollux.

here is no occasion for your accusing Vestorius. After I had sealed this letter, my messenger came in the night, and brought me a letter from written with great exactness, and likewise a copy of the will.

LETTER XLVII.

As soon as your servant Agamemno touched the subject, not of my going up, (though I had done that also, if it had not been for natus,) but of my writing; I immediately ended my business, laid aside what I had in hand, have executed what you desired. I shall be to have you made acquainted with the account of expenses<sup>1</sup> through Pollex. For it would not be edifiable to me to leave him<sup>2</sup> in distress this year, whatever may have been his conduct. I shall regulate matters more carefully. The same Pollex must be sent back to accept<sup>3</sup> on my behalf. It was impossible for me to go to Li<sup>4</sup>, as well for the reasons I mentioned to you as on account of Cæsar's approach. Dolabella writes word that he will come to me the 14th. It is irksome to be subject to a master<sup>5</sup>! Yesterday evening Lepidus wrote to me from Rome, where he was staying,—for he has the house which I sold. He requests me with great urgency to attend the senate on the first; that would greatly oblige both himself and Cæsar. If it is nothing, else Oppius would probably do something to you,—for Balbus is ill. How could I would rather go up to no purpose, than if there should be any real occasion. I am sorry for it afterwards. Therefore to-morrow I shall be at Antium; to-morrow before noon I shall reach home<sup>6</sup>. If nothing prevents you, I and Pilia would dine with me on the 31st. I have settled everything with Publius<sup>7</sup>. I run back to Tusculanum on the 1st; for I rather everything should be arranged with me in my absence. I send you my brother's letter; not a very kind reply to mine, but as may give you satisfaction, so far as I am concerned. You will see.

LETTER XLVIII.

ON FRIDAY in the midst of noise<sup>1</sup> I fancy I am doing something about your coming to Tusculanum, which I wish, and wish again; yet with some inconvenience. Lepta requests that, if his expenses he had been at for his son at Athens. I am sorry for my son. I accept formally Clivius's bequest. See letter 46 of the seat of Clivius's estate. I am setting Torquatus. See letter 45 of this book. I have been variously interpreted. I understand it as expressive of his indignation at being obliged to submit to the directions of Dolabella and Lepidus, in order to obtain Cæsar's favour. I mean, he here and elsewhere means his house in accordance to Cicero's second wife. See letter 34 of this book. I am writing to Pilius, respecting the re-payment of the money.

affairs demand it, I will go up,—for Babullius is dead. Cæsar, I believe, inherits one twelfth, though nothing has yet transpired. Lepta succeeds to a third; but he is afraid he may not be allowed to take possession of the inheritance. There is no reason for this; but, however, he is afraid. If therefore he sends for me, I shall hasten up,—else I shall not go before it is necessary. Send back Pollex as soon as you can. I have sent you the panegyric on Porcia<sup>1</sup> corrected; and I have done it the sooner, that if it should happen to be sent to her son Domitius, or to Brutus, it may be sent in this form. If you can conveniently do it, I should be greatly obliged to you to attend to this; and I wish you would send me the panegyric<sup>2</sup> of M. Varro and of Lollius, especially Lollius's, for the other I have read, yet I want to look at it again,—for there are some parts which I hardly recollect.

LETTER XLIX.

I must first send my compliments to Attica<sup>1</sup>, who, I suppose, is in the country; then give my best compliments to Pilia likewise. Let me hear of Tigellius, if there is anything new; for, as Gallus Fabius informs me, he brings against me a most unjust charge of having deserted Phamea, after undertaking his cause. This I undertook, not with my good liking, against the young Octavius, the sons of Cnæus; but I agreed to it out of regard to Phamea. For, if you remember, he had promised me through you, to assist me in my canvass for the consulship, if there should be any occasion, which I looked upon in the same light as if I had actually made use of him. He came to me, and said that the judge had appointed to hear his cause on the very day when it was necessary for me to attend the council about my friend Sestius by the Pompeian law: for you know the days for those judgments are fixed. I replied that he could not be ignorant of my obligations to Sestius; that if he had taken any other day whatever, I would not fail him. Upon this he went away angry. I believe I told you about it. However, I did not make myself uneasy, nor did I think it necessary to pay attention to the unmerited displeasure of one with whom I was unconnected. I mentioned however to Gallus, when I was lately at Rome, what I had heard, but without naming the younger Balbus<sup>2</sup>. Gallus, as he writes word, had some business of his own. He says that Tigellius suspects me of having injured him from a consciousness of infidelity towards Phamea. I therefore send you this detail, that, if you can, you may learn something about this friend<sup>3</sup> of mine. Do not be in any trouble about me<sup>4</sup>: it is well, if anybody be allowed to

<sup>3</sup> The particular occasion of this appears, by letter 50 of this book, to have been Attica's recovery from some illness, on which he congratulates both her and her mother.

<sup>4</sup> From whom it is to be presumed that Cicero had heard of something said or done unkindly by Tigellius towards him.

<sup>5</sup> This seems to me to mean Tigellius, and is to be understood sneeringly. Tigellius was grandson to Phamea.—Ep. Fam. vii. 24.

<sup>6</sup> Tigellius was a singer in the train of Cæsar. Cicero says that he had nothing to apprehend from his hostility.

hate at his own free-will<sup>2</sup>; it has an appearance of not being entirely slaves. Though indeed, as you perceive, those people<sup>3</sup> are rather slaves to me, if paying attention be the test of servitude.

LETTER L.

HAVING been advised in some of your letters to write to Cæsar in a more copious manner, and having lately understood from Balbus in Lanuvium, that he and Oppius had written to Cæsar, and informed him of my having read and greatly commended his book against Cato, I have written a letter to Cæsar, on the subject of this book, to be delivered to Dolabella. But I sent a copy of it to Oppius and Balbus, and have desired them not to let my letter be delivered to Dolabella, unless they approve of the copy. They have replied to me, that they never read anything better, and they ordered the letter to be given to Dolabella. Vestorius has written to me to direct the Brinnian estate<sup>4</sup> to be surrendered on my part to one Heterieus, his servant; in order that he<sup>5</sup> might himself properly surrender to him<sup>6</sup> that<sup>7</sup> at Puteoli. If you approve of this, send that servant to me. I imagine Vestorius will also have written to you. On the subject of Cæsar's coming, I have heard from Oppius and Balbus the same as from you. I am surprised you should yet have had no communication with Tigellius, if it be only to know how much he has received<sup>8</sup>. I am curious to know, though I care not a farthing. You ask what I think about going to meet him<sup>9</sup>: what think you of my going as far as Alsium? I have even written to Murena about receiving me; but I apprehend he is gone forward with Matius. I shall therefore apply to Sallustius. Just as I had written this last line, Eroë has informed me that Murena made him the kindest answer. I shall therefore lodge with him,—for Silius has no beds: and Dida, I believe, has his house quite full.

LETTER LI.

I FORGOO to send you a copy of my letter to Cæsar, which was not, as you suspect, because I was ashamed of your seeing it, lest in ridicule I should be called Micillus<sup>1</sup>. In faith, I have written no otherwise than to one on a par and equality; for I think well of that book<sup>2</sup>, as I told you in person. I wrote therefore without flattery, and yet so that I think he will read nothing with more pleasure. I am now at length satisfied about Attica: therefore congratulate her again. Tell me all about Tigellius, and as soon as you can,—for I am in great doubt. I can inform you that Quintus comes to-morrow; but whether to me or

to you I am uncertain. He wrote me word that he should come to Rome the 25th; but I have not to invite him<sup>1</sup>, though it obliges me to go presently to Rome, that he may not arrive before me.

LETTER LII.

ON THE troublesome guest<sup>1</sup>! But I had no reason to repent of it: for it turned out very pleasantly. Upon his arrival at Philippus's on the evening of the second day of the Saturnalia<sup>2</sup>, the house was so filled with soldiers, that there was scarcely space left for Cæsar himself to dine. There were 2000 people. I was indeed disturbed at thinking what would be the case the next day<sup>3</sup>. Barba Cassius came to my assistance, and set a guard. An encampment was formed in the fields; the house was secured. On the third of the Saturnalia, he remained at Philippus's till one in the afternoon, and did not admit anybody. I imagine he was settling his accounts with Balbus: then he walked on the beach. After two o'clock he went into the bath; then he heard about Mamurra<sup>4</sup>: he never changed countenance: he was anointed, and sat down to table, following an emetic course<sup>5</sup>. So he ate and drank without reserve, and in good-humour; sumptuously indeed, and with due preparation; and not only that, but "with good conversation well digested and seasoned, and, if you ask, cheerfully<sup>6</sup>." His attendants were besides entertained at three tables very plentifully. Nor was anything wanting for the inferior freed-men and slaves; while those of higher condition were elegantly served. In short, I thought myself a man<sup>7</sup> again. Yet my guest was not one to whom you would say—"Pray come to me in the same manner when you return." Once is enough. There was nothing of importance in the conversation, but a great deal of liberal learning. In short, he was highly pleased, and enjoyed himself. He said he should pass one day at Puteoli, and one at Baiæ. You have here the account of my hospitality or forced<sup>8</sup> entertainment, which was hateful to me, I say, not disagreeable. I shall stay here<sup>9</sup> a little while, then go to Tuscanum. As he passed Dolabella's villa, the whole body of armed men ranged themselves on each side of his horse<sup>10</sup>, which was done nowhere else. This I heard from Nicias.

LETTER I.

[I HAVE been to call upon the person<sup>a</sup> about whom I spoke to you this morning. He said nothing could be more ruinous; that the state could not be settled. For if he<sup>b</sup>, with all his abilities, and no way of doing it, who will now find any? short, he said that all was ruined. I know not to be so. But he affirmed, with apparent satisfaction, that in less than twenty days there would be an insurrection in Gaul; that, for his own part, on the 15th of March<sup>c</sup> he had conversed with nobody besides Lepidus; in conclusion, that it was possible things should stop here. O prudent Pompeius! who does no less regret Cæsar, while he does nothing that can give offence to any honest man. But enough of this. Whatever new occurs [I expect a great deal], I beg you will not fail to write. Among other things, whether this is the aim about Sextus<sup>d</sup>; but above all about our dear Brutus; of whom Cæsar used to say (as I heard from him with whom I have been), that "it is of great importance what he wishes; for what he wishes, he wishes strongly." He<sup>e</sup> took notice of this, when he<sup>f</sup> spoke for Deiotarus at Rome, "that he seemed to speak with great reverence and freedom." Likewise (for I like to know everything as it occurs) very lately, when I was at his house by desire of Sestius, and sat down with him, he<sup>g</sup> said: "Can I doubt of my being greatly hated, when M. Cicero is obliged to me and cannot get an audience at his own convenience? Yet if anybody is gracious, it is he; yet the less I doubt not that he hates me bitterly." He<sup>h</sup> told me, and much more of the same. But to my purpose. Whatever may happen, I will inform you of great, but also of little moment, you will inform me. On my part I will omit nothing.

LETTER II.

YESTERDAY I received two letters from you. The first I learned the circumstances of the death of, and Publius<sup>a</sup>; good indications of the confidence of the populace. The applause, which was given to L. Cassius, has even some pleasantries<sup>b</sup>. Your letter is upon the subject of Bald Cape<sup>c</sup>, Atticus. See letters 3 and 4 of this book.

<sup>f</sup> Probably some actor, who may have been cheered in the theatre for allusion to the downfall of tyranny. See of this book.

<sup>g</sup> Cassius being applauded not for any merit of his at that time because his brother C. Cassius had been one of the concerned in killing Cæsar.

<sup>h</sup> There is no doubt of M. being intended under the name of Madarus, which in Greek signifies bald, the subject of the word φαλάκρεια signifying a bald head, or naked head, such as usually protects a harbour. But in this instance it afforded so little hope of tranquillity, that it did not remain there; M. being evidently hoswhich affords however no safe harbour, as you suppose. For I went on, though not so far as I had intended, being detained a long time in conversation. What I wrote to you, obscurely perhaps, was this; he said that Cæsar had observed to him, upon the occasion of my being kept waiting, when I went to him at Sestius's request: "Can I now be so foolish as to suppose this easy man will be friendly to me, after he has been kept so long waiting for my convenience?" You have then a "bald cape" very unfriendly to tranquillity; that is, to Brutus. I am going to-day to Tusculanum, to-morrow to Lanuvium; thence I mean to proceed to Astura. Everything is ready for Pilia's reception<sup>d</sup>; but I want likewise to see Attica, though I forgive you<sup>e</sup>. My compliments to both of them.

LETTER III.

YOUR letter is still peaceful. I wish this may last; for M. said it was impossible. And my workmen, mark you, who went to purchase corn, returned empty-handed, and brought a strong report from Rome that all the corn was taken to Antonius's house. This is certainly a false alarm, or you would have written to inform me. Balbus's freed-man Corumbus has not yet been here. The name is familiar to me; for he is said to be a clever architect. You seem to have been employed to countersign<sup>b</sup> not without reason; for so these people would have us think<sup>c</sup>. I do not know why they should not feel it also in their heart. But what are these things to me? However, scent out Antonius's real disposition. I suspect him rather of solicitude about his table, than of designing any mischief. If you have anything of importance, let me know it; or if not, tell me the indications of popular feeling, and the sayings of the actors<sup>d</sup>. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER IV.

WHAT news do you suppose I can have at Lanuvium? But I imagine that you there<sup>a</sup> must every day receive some fresh intelligence. The times are pregnant with business. For when M. is so indisposed to peace, what think you of others? I am grieved indeed that (what never till to Brutus, from whose cause alone tranquillity could be expected.

<sup>b</sup> Forgive you for keeping her with you.

<sup>c</sup> To set his seal as witness to the wills of some of Cæsar's party, who wished to secure Cicero's friendship by their bequests, to which Atticus was privy.

<sup>d</sup> Think them to be Cicero's friends. It alludes to something previously mentioned by Atticus.

happened in any other state) together with liberty the republic should not have been restored. What is talked of, and threatened, is dreadful. I am afraid also of hostilities in Gaul, and what Sextus<sup>1</sup> may attempt. But whatever happens, this 15th of March is a consolation. Our heroes<sup>m</sup>, as far as lay in them, have acted gloriously and magnificently. What remains to be done, requires supplies and forces, of which we have none. I write this, that if there is anything new, (for every day I expect something), you may immediately let me know it; and if there is nothing new, yet that, according to custom, our correspondence may suffer no interruption. I will take care it shall not on my part.

LETTER V.

HAVING used abstinence before you were seriously indisposed, I hope that all is now as I could wish; yet I should be glad to know how you do. It is a good sign, that Calvena<sup>a</sup> is uneasy at being suspected by Brutus. But this is no good sign, that the legions are coming with their ensigns from Gaul. What do you think of those which have been in Spain? Will they not make the same demands<sup>o</sup>? What of those which Annius took over<sup>p</sup>? I should have said Caninius, but it was a slip of the memory. There will be great confusion excited by this gamester<sup>q</sup>. For that conspiracy of Cæsar's freed-men might easily be put down, if Antonius were right-minded. Mine was a foolish scrupulousness in declining to get an honorary legation<sup>r</sup> before the adjournment, that I might not seem to desert this swell of affairs, from which, if it were possible for me to remedy it, I certainly ought not to withhold my services. But you see the magistrates, if indeed they deserve the name, you see however the minions of the tyrant in authority; you see his veteran troops at our side<sup>s</sup>; all which are unstable<sup>t</sup> things; while they<sup>u</sup>, who ought not only to be protected, but exalted, by the guards of the whole world, are rewarded neither with praise nor love, but confined within their own walls<sup>v</sup>. Yet, after all, it is they that are happy: the state that is wretched. But I should be glad to know what effect the approach of Octavius<sup>w</sup> produces; whether people flock to him; whether there is any apprehension of usurpation. I do not think it; but yet, whatever happens, I wish to know it. I write this to you on the 12th, setting out from Astura.

It is not improbable that Atticus may first have used Madarus, derived from the Greek, which was familiar to him; and that Cicero may have invented the corresponding word Calvena from the Latin.

LETTER VI.

I RECEIVED your letter on the 12th at Fundi, while I was at dinner. In the first place therefore I was glad to hear that you were better; then that you made a better report of public affairs; for I did not like that approach of the troops. About Octavius I am very indifferent. I am curious to hear something of Marius<sup>x</sup>, whom I supposed to have been put death by Cæsar. Antonius's interview with our heroes<sup>y</sup> passed off very well for the occasion. Hitherto, however, nothing gives me pleasure besides the 15th of March. Here at Fundi, where I am with my friend Ligur, I am distracted at seeing Sextilius's farm in the possession of that rascal Cutilius; and what I say of him, I say of the whole tribe. For what can be more sad, than to look upon the very things which made us hate him<sup>z</sup>? Are we also to have for two years the consuls and tribunes of the people, which he chose? I am quite at a loss to know what part I can take in public affairs. Nothing was ever so inconsistent, as that the destroyers of the tyrant should be praised to the skies, while the acts of the tyrant are defended. But you see the consuls; you see the other magistrates (if they deserve the name); you see the want of energy in the good. In the country towns the people are exulting with joy. It cannot be told how much they are delighted, how they flock about me, how eager they are to hear every word relating to that affair.<sup>a</sup> Yet in all this time no decrees are passed. For such is the state of our government, that we are afraid of the very people we have defeated. I write this during my desert. I will write more fully on public affairs another time. Let me on your part hear how you do, and what is going forward.

LETTER VII.

ON the 14th I saw Paullus in Caieta, who informed me about Marius, and mentioned some other things relating to the republic, which were indeed very sad. There has been nothing from you, for none of my people have arrived. But I hear that our friend Brutus was seen near Lanuvium. Where does he intend to fix himself? For while I wish to be acquainted with everything else, so particularly with what concerns him. I write this the 15th, on the point of leaving Formianum, that from thence in another day I may reach Puteolanum. I have received from Cicero a letter smacking of the ancient style, and of considerable length. The rest may possibly be feigned; but the style of his letter shows that he has acquired some learning. Now I earnestly beg you to take care, as I lately mentioned to you, that he may not be left in want of anything. This concerns my credit and dignity, as well as my duty; and I understand that you are entirely of the same opinion. If then there is an opportunity, I think of going into Greece in the month of July. I hope everything may be more favourable. But the times being such that it is impossible to say certainly what may be proper for me, what allowable, what pendient; pray take care that I may support him honourably and handsomely. You will take into your consideration, as usual, this, and whatever concerns me; and you will write to me all that is interesting, or, if there is nothing, what comes to your head.

LETTER VIII.

WHEN you wrote, you supposed me to be already in one of my houses on the coast; and I lived your letter on the 16th at the little cottage Sinuessa<sup>1</sup>. About Marius it is quite right, though I must needs grieve for the grandson<sup>2</sup> of Crassus. I rejoice also that our friend Brutus is well satisfied with Antonius<sup>3</sup>. For as to what say of Junia's<sup>4</sup> having brought a letter written in temperate and friendly manner; Paullus<sup>5</sup> gave me one that he had received from his brother; at conclusion of which he mentions that a plot had been formed against him, of which he had certain information. I did not like this, much less did he. I am not sorry for the queen's<sup>6</sup> flight; but I want to inform me what is become of Clodia<sup>7</sup>. She will take care about the Byzantians, as about anything else, and will send for Pelops to come on. As soon as I have seen into the business of Balba<sup>8</sup>, and that assemblage, about whom you wish to be informed, I will write, as you desire, you may know everything. I am anxiously expecting what the Gauls, what the Spaniards, Sextus will do. This you will tell me, who know everything. I am glad that the reason of silence was nothing but a slight indisposition; seem, as I read your letters, to feel a temporary case. Always write to me everything that comes to Brutus, where he is, and what are his intentions. I hope he may now safely walk alone over the city. But yet I should like to know<sup>9</sup>.

Sinuessa is on the sea-coast, whither Atticus's letter was sent. It appears, from book xvi. letter 10, that he had a house there.

his pretender had been put to death by Antonius. He has been the person whose name he assumed, he has been grandson to L. Crassus. See book xii. 50.

Brutus's agreement with Antonius was likely to lead to peace.

Junia was sister to Brutus, and wife to M. Lepidus, who had the government of Transalpine Gaul. The plot must probably have been from Lepidus, the friend and ally to Brutus. The good understanding of the opportunities apparent from this letter, would be destroyed by the treachery, or the suspicion of plots, such as is afterwards mentioned.

Æmilius Paullus, brother to Lepidus.

Seopatra, who had followed Cæsar to Rome, and now on the event of his assassination.

what this alludes to, or the following mention of the Gauls, is not known.

When Cicero speaks of "the business" of Balba, he is supposed to mean the conversation and idle talk, being notorious for idleness. And this sense receives confirmation from the word chorum, which I have rendered "assemblage," but which in the original means properly a company of dancers or singers. The expressions may be borrowed from Atticus, who seems often to indulge in a little good-humoured bantering, and also with terms newly invented or newly applied. See book iv. letter 8.] It is to this that Cicero alludes (letter 14 of this book) when he says joca tua plena sunt. See letter 5 of this book.

LETTER IX.

I HAVE learned a great deal about the republic from your letters, several of which I received at the same time by Vestorius's freed-man. To your questions I shall reply briefly. In the first place, I am greatly delighted with the Cluvian inheritance<sup>1</sup>; but as to what you ask, why I sent for Chrysippus<sup>2</sup>; I had two cottages in ruins, and the rest were so crazy, that not only the lodgers, but the very rats had left them. Some people would call this a calamity; for my part, I do not think it even a disadvantage. O Socrates, and ye of the Socratic school<sup>3</sup>, I shall never be sufficiently thankful to you. Ye immortal gods! how totally do I disregard such things. But, however, I have got such a plan for building, by the recommendation and assistance of Vestorius, that this loss will be a real gain to me. There is a great course here; and, as I am told, it will be still greater. Two, indeed, are the pretended<sup>4</sup> consuls elect. O gracious gods! The tyranny survives, though the tyrant is dead. We rejoice in the death of the victim, whose acts we defend. How severely, therefore, does M. Curtius accuse us, as if it were a disgrace to live! And not without reason. For it had been better to die a thousand times than to suffer such a state of things, which seems likely even to be permanent. Balbus also is here, and is much with me. He had received a letter from Vetus<sup>5</sup>, dated the 31st of December, stating that at the time he was besieging Cæcilius<sup>6</sup>, and had almost taken him. Pacorus the Parthian came up with a large army, by which means Cæcilius had been snatched from him, and he had lost many of his men; in which affair he accuses Volcatius. Thus a war in that quarter appears imminent. But let Dolabella and Nicias<sup>7</sup> see to this. At the same time Balbus gave me more favourable accounts of Gaul. He had a letter twenty days after its date, saying that the Germani, and those nations, upon hearing about Cæsar, had sent deputies to Aurelius, who was left in the command by Hirtius, professing their submission to such orders as they should receive. In short, everything wore the appearance of peace, contrary to what Calpurnius<sup>8</sup> had said.

LETTER X.

Is it so, then? Has my and your Brutus found this fruit of his exertion, that he should be shut up in Lanuvium? That Trebonius should proceed to his province through by-ways? That all the acts, writings, sayings, promises, thoughts of Cæsar, <sup>4</sup> Hirtius and Pansa, who had been appointed by Cæsar, not elected by the votes of the people according to the laws of the republic.

<sup>7</sup> Dolabella was going into Syria to conduct the war against the Parthians, and Nicias accompanied him, being attached by familiarity and friendship.

should have greater force than if he were himself alive? Do you remember how I demanded, on that very first capitoline<sup>a</sup> day, that the senate should be summoned by the prætors<sup>1</sup> into the capitol! Ye immortal gods! What operations might then have been effected; while all good, or tolerably good people were exulting; and the rogues were confounded? You lay the blame on the 18th of March<sup>a</sup>. But what could have been done then? We were already ruined. Do you remember exclaiming that the cause was ruined, if he should be buried with funeral honours? Yet he was burned in the public forum, and extolled to excite pity; and slaves and beggars were sent with torches against our houses. What followed? That they dared to say, "Do you oppose the nod of Cæsar?" These, and other things of the same kind, I am unable to bear; therefore I think of changing my country for another. But has your windy colic entirely left you? As far as I could judge by your letters, it seemed to be so. I come back to the Tebassi<sup>a</sup>, the Scævas, the Frangos. Do you imagine that they expect to hold their possessions, while our authority still subsists? For they gave us credit for more valour than they have found. Will these, forsooth, be lovers of peace, and not rather authors of plunder? But what I said to you about Curtilius<sup>a</sup> and the Sextilian estate, I say about Censorinus, about Messala, about Plancus, about Postumius, about the whole set. It were better to have died when he<sup>a</sup> died (which I wish<sup>a</sup> had happened), than to witness these things. Octavius arrived in Naples the 18th<sup>a</sup>. There Balbus saw him the following morning, and the same day came to me in Cumana, and said that he<sup>a</sup> was going to enter upon his inheritance<sup>b</sup>. But, as you say, he must have a great contest-radical<sup>c</sup> with Antonius. Your Buthrotian<sup>d</sup> affair is, as it ought and shall be, an object of my care. You ask if the Clavian inheritance<sup>e</sup> has already produced a hundred sestertia (800*l.*). It seems to approach to this; but in the first year I have cleared eighty (640*l.*). Quintus the father has written to me in vexation about his son, principally owing to the fondness he now shows to his mother, towards whom he was before so undeservedly hostile. He has sent me some flaming letters against him. What he is doing, if you know, and have not yet left Rome, I should be glad if you would inform me; and indeed, if there is anything else. I am infinitely delighted with your letters.

LETTER XI.

THE day before yesterday I sent you a longer letter. I shall now reply to the contents of your last. I should in truth be very glad to let Brutus occupy Astura<sup>a</sup>. You speak of the intemperance of those people: did you expect it to be otherwise? For my part, I look for yet greater things. When I read the harangue about "so great a man," about so "distinguished a citizen," I am unable to bear it. Though these things may now make one smile, yet remember, the custom of pernicious harangues is so cherished, that those our gods, not heroes, will live indeed in eternal glory, but not without envy, not even without danger. Yet they have a great consolation in the consciousness of the noblest and most famous deed. But what consolation is left for us, who, when our king is killed, are yet not free? But let fortune see to this, since reason does not rule. I am pleased with what you tell me of Cicero. I wish all may go on well. The care you take to supply him amply for his use and ornament is very grateful to me, and I beg you to continue it. Respecting the Buthrotians you judge very rightly, and I do not forget that concern. I will also undertake all legal actions which I perceive daily to become easier. With regard to the Clavian inheritance (since the interest you take in my affairs exceeds even my own), the rents amount to a hundred (800*l.*). The downfall<sup>b</sup> has not lessened the property; I do not know if it may not have improved it. I have with me here Balbus, Hirtius, and Pansa. Octavius has lately arrived at the neighbouring house of Philippus. He is entirely devoted to me. Lentulus Spinther is coming to me to-day, and goes away to-morrow morning.

LETTER XII.

O MY Atticus, I fear this 15th of March may be productive of no other issue than a transitory joy, followed by the penalty of odium and grief. What is it that I hear from thence<sup>1</sup>? What do I witness here<sup>2</sup>? A noble act indeed, but fruitless! You know how much I am attached to the people of Sicily, and how honourable I esteem that patronage. Cæsar conferred upon them many benefits, to which I did not object, though their admission to the rights of Latium was too much. However, let that pass. But see now, Antonius, in consideration of a large sum of money, has promulged a law, said to have been proposed by the dictator in the comitia, by which the Sicilians are made Roman citizens, <sup>11</sup> Atticus had considerable possessions at Buthrotum in Epirus; in consideration of which, he had not only got that country exempted from proscription, but had paid to Cæsar's officers a large sum in discharge of the contributions demanded of the inhabitants. This he was anxious to have ratified by the consuls according to the law for ratifying Cæsar's acts. See Appendix, No. 1.

which there was never any mention during his. Nay, is not the case the same with my friend Octavius? He is worthy indeed of any kingdom; not through the influence of Fulvia<sup>1</sup>. There are six hundred things of the same kind. But I come back to my purpose. In a cause so clear, so attested, and so just, as that of Buthrotum<sup>2</sup>, will we obtain no satisfaction? We may the more respect it, the more he<sup>3</sup> thus dispenses. Octavius conducts himself here in a manner very respectful and friendly towards me. His own people saluted him as Caesar<sup>4</sup>; but Philippus<sup>5</sup> did not, therefore he did it. I do not think it possible for him to be a good citizen, so many people are about him, threaten the death of our friends. They<sup>6</sup> these things are not to be borne. What think when this boy<sup>7</sup> shall come to Rome, where liberators cannot be in safety? Famous indeed will always be, and happy too in the consciousness of what they have achieved. But we, unless receive myself, shall lie in disgrace. I wish, therefore, to get away, where "I may hear nothing of Pelopides<sup>8</sup>," as the poet says. I do not like these consuls elect, who have, however, forced me to declaim<sup>9</sup>; so that I am not permitted to be so even at this watering-place. This is owing to my too great complaisance. Formerly it was necessary; but now, whatever be the state of things, the case is altered. For a good while I have had nothing to write to you; yet I, not because I can afford you any pleasure by writing, but that I may elicit yours. Do you, if it is anything about other matters, but especially whatever occurs relative to Brutus, let me know it. Write to this on the 22d<sup>10</sup>, while I am at table at Octavius's house, a man unused to argument, but entirely versed in arithmetic<sup>11</sup>.

LETTER XIII.

THE letter of the 19th was delivered to me on the twentieth day after. You ask, and even suppose I do not myself know, whether I am most delighted with the hills and prospect, or with the sun on the level beach<sup>12</sup>. And indeed, as you say, the beauty of both is such, that I doubt which is to be preferred. But "we have other cares than those of entertainments, and see with dread a prodigious mischief gathering, and stand in doubt whether we shall be saved, or perish<sup>13</sup>." For though you send me great and pleasing intelligence of D. Brutus<sup>14</sup> having joined his troops, in whom my best hopes reside; yet, if a civil war breaks out, as it certainly will if Sextus remains in arms, which I am confident he will, what part I ought to take I know not. For it will not now be allowable, as it was in Caesar's war, to move neither to one side nor the other. But whosoever this set of scoundrels supposes to have been pleased with Caesar's death (and we have all most openly showed our joy), him they will hold to be in the number of their enemies. And this consideration leads to a most extensive slaughter. It remains for me, then, to join the army of Sextus<sup>15</sup>, or perhaps of Brutus. An odious measure, at once foreign from our age, and exposed to the uncertain issue of war. So that we may in some measure say to each other, "My child, to you are not granted warlike operations; do you rather employ yourself in the lovely works of speech<sup>16</sup>." But this must be left to fortune, which in such circumstances is of more avail than reason. Let us, however, see to that, which ought to be in our own power; that whatever happens we may bear it with fortitude and self-possession, and may remember that it is the condition of humanity: and let us still derive great consolation from literature, and not a little also from the 15th of March. Take now upon yourself the consideration of what constitutes my present solicitude, so many things occur to my mind both ways. I am going, as I had arranged, with a nominal appointment<sup>17</sup> to Greece. I may thus in some measure escape the danger of the impending conflict, but am likely to incur blame for deserting the republic at so difficult a crisis. Should I remain, I foresee that I must be exposed to great risk; but I conceive it may happen that I may be able to be of use to the republic. The following considerations are of a private nature; that I think it may be very advantageous for the confirmation of my son, that I should go thither; nor indeed had I any other object in view at the time when I determined to get from Caesar an honorary lieutenantancy. You will take this whole business, therefore, into your consideration, as you use to do where you think me to be concerned. I come now to your letter, in which you say it is rumoured that I am going to sell the property which I have at the lake<sup>18</sup>; and to convey to Quintus that little place at an extravagant price, that the rich Aquillia, as young Quintus told you, may be introduced there<sup>19</sup>. But I have no thought of selling it, unless I should find something which I like better; and Quintus has, at this time, no wish to purchase; for he has enough to do in the repayment of his wife's dower<sup>d</sup>, in which he is under great obligations to Egnatius. And as for taking another wife, he is so far from it, that he declares nothing is more delightful than a single bed. But enough of this. I revert to the wretched, or rather the lost republic. M. Antonius has written to me about the restoration of Sextus Clodius<sup>e</sup>; how honourably, as far as relates to me, you will see by his own letter, of which I send you a copy; how profligately, how basely, how mischievously (so that I sometimes almost wish for Cæsar again), you will easily believe. For things which Cæsar would never either have done or suffered, are now brought forward from his forged instructions. I have treated Antonius with all civility; for having once persuaded himself that he was at liberty to do what he chose, he would not the less have done it for my disapprobation. Therefore I send you likewise a copy of my answer.

It has happened from my occupations, and your sudden departure, that I have been prevented from treating with you personally upon the following business; and in consequence am apprehensive that my absence may lessen the weight I might have with you. But if your goodness corresponds with the opinion I have always entertained of you, I shall sincerely rejoice. I begged of Cæsar to restore Sex. Clodius; and I gained my suit. It was my intention, even then, to use his kindness only on the condition of your acceding to it; which makes me the more earnest that I may now be permitted to do it with your consent. But if you show yourself unmoved by his miserable and ruined fortune, I shall not contend against you, however I may seem bound to support Cæsar's will. Yet in truth, if you are disposed to regard me with humanity, with prudence and charity, you will easily be persuaded; and will be glad that P. Clodius<sup>f</sup>, a youth of the fairest hopes, should think that, when it was in your power, you did not persecute his father's friends. Let it, I entreat you, appear that you engaged in hostility with his father for the republic's sake; and you will not despise this family. For we more honourably, and more readily, lay aside the quarrels which have been taken up in the name of the republic, than those of private pique. Suffer me then to instil into this youth, even now, these sentiments, and to teach his tender mind that quarrels are not to be transmitted to posterity. Though I know well that your fortune, Cicero, is exempt from all danger; yet I apprehend you would rather pass a tranquil and honourable old age, than one of vexation. Lastly, I ask this favour of you by my own right, having done everything in my power for your sake. Should I not obtain your consent, so far as I am concerned, I shall not give this boon to Clodius; that you may understand how great your authority is with me, and may for that reason be the more easily conciliated.

Cicero to Antonius, Consul.

WHAT you negotiate with me by letter, I should for one reason only have wished to negotiate in person; that you might have perceived not by my words alone, but also by my countenance, and eyes, and forehead, as they say, the affection I bear you. For having always loved you, as indeed I was constrained to do, first by your attention, afterwards also by the favours I received, so in these times the republic has attached me to you in such a manner, that I hold nobody dearer; and the letter you have written full of affection and consideration, makes me feel not that I am doing a kindness to you, but receiving one from you; while in your request you refuse to serve my enemy, though your own relation, against my consent; when you have it in your power to do so without any difficulty. But, my Antonius, I not only concede this to you; but such are the expressions you use, that I consider myself most liberally and honourably treated. And though in any case I should think it right freely to grant this to you, I am glad to do it also in consideration of my own feelings and disposition. For I never entertained any bitterness, nor anything that partakes of austerity or severity, beyond what the necessity of the republic demanded. To which I may add, that against Clodius<sup>g</sup> himself I never showed any signs of anger; and have always made it a rule, not to persecute an enemy's friends, especially those without power; and not to deprive ourselves of the protection they afforded. Respecting young Clodius, I consider it to be your business to imbue his tender mind, as you say, with these sentiments, that he may not suppose any hostility to remain between our families. In my contentions with P. Clodius I supported the public cause; he his own. The republic has passed its judgment upon our struggles. If he were living, I should now have no quarrel remaining with him. Therefore, since you ask this of me in such a manner, that, notwithstanding your power, you refuse to make use of it without my consent, pray give this also to the young man, if you think fit; not that my age has any danger to apprehend from his youth; or that my dignity has to fear any opposition; but that you and I may be mutually united together more than we have hitherto been. For owing to the intervention of these hostilities, your heart has been more open to me, than your house. But enough of this. I have only to say, that I shall always, without hesitation, and with the greatest zeal, do whatever I think will please you, or contribute to your advantage; of which I beg you to be thoroughly persuaded.

LETTER XIV.

REPEAT again those same words to me<sup>h</sup>. Has our young Quintus worn a chaplet in the public<sup>i</sup>!

<sup>i</sup> The Parilia were celebrated the 21st of April; but Cæsar having received the news of a victory gained in Spain on the eve of this annual festival, appointed additional games to be observed ever after in memory of that event. Young Quintus wore a chaplet on this occasion to show his attachment to Cæsar.

Was he the only one? though you add which I am surprised at; but I wish to who there were besides. I am quite sure there could be nobody who was not a bad man. Yet let me hear the particulars. It happens that I had despatched to you my letter of which written at considerable length, about three before I received yours full of important matter. I need not tell you how heartily I laughed at the pleasantries and wit on the Vestorine heresy, the Puteolan custom of the Pherios. But let me know to what more immediately concerns the Republic. You defend the party of Brutus and Cassius if I reproached them, whom I cannot justly praise. But I summed up the faults of the Republic, not of the men. For after the tyrant was removed, I see the tyranny continue. So that he would not have done, is now done; the case of Clodius; respecting whom I am content that he not only would not have done it, but did not even have suffered it. Rufio Vestorius will follow, (who was never written of) and others. Who will not? We could not be the slaves of the man himself; yet did obedience to his memorandums. For on the 15th of March who could absent himself from the senate? But suppose that this might in some way have been possible; yet, when we had yielded, could we freely deliver our opinions? not necessary by all means to support the soldiers, who were present, and armed, we had nothing to protect us? How little I agreed with that session in the capitol, you see. What then? Was that the fault of Vestorius? By no means indeed of those; but of other Brutuses, who think themselves cautious and prudent; who were satisfied with a secret joy; while some even expressed congratulations; but none remained firm. We omit what is past; let us support these with every care and protection; and, as you say, let us be content to think ourselves happy on the 15th of March; which to our friends indeed, more than mortal men, has given an accession; but has not given freedom to the Roman Republic. Recollect your own prediction. Do you all of those who exerted themselves to restore the Republic; but of others, who refused to support them, seeing attachment to the cause of liberty.

not remember how you exclaimed that everything was lost, if he should have a public funeral? You said it wisely; and you see what has flowed from that circumstance. As to what you mention, that Antonius was to bring forward the subject of the provinces on the first of June, of which he was himself to have the two Gauls, with extension of the ordinary time in both: will it be allowed to vote freely? If it is, I shall rejoice at the recovery of our liberty; if not, what do I get by this change of masters, besides the pleasure with which my eyes beheld the just fall of the tyrant? You say that the temple of Ops has been plundered; which I foresaw at that time. Verily we have been set free by excellent men, and yet are not free. So the praise is theirs, the blame our own. And do you exhort me to write history? To collect together the wicked acts of these people, by whom we are even now besieged? Can I avoid commending those same persons, who have employed you to countersign? Not that the paltry interest weighs with me; but it is hard to visit with reproach people, whoever they are, that are kindly disposed. But about all my designs, as you mention, I think I shall be able to decide more certainly on the 1st of June, on which day I shall be in Rome, and will use my utmost endeavours, with the help of your authority and influence, and the perfect justice of the cause, that a decree of the senate may be obtained in the case of the Buthrotians, such as you describe. What you bid me consider, I will consider; though in my last letter I had referred the consideration to you. But you are for restoring to your neighbours, the Marsilians, their property; as if the republic were already re-established. It may perhaps be possible to do this by arms, in which what strength we possess I know not; by authority it is impossible.

LETTER XV.

THE short letter, which you afterwards wrote, was indeed very pleasing to me, about Brutus's letter to Antonius, and the other to you. Things wear a better appearance than they have hitherto done. But I must consider where I am, and which way I should even now proceed. My charming Dolabella! For I now call him mine; before, believe me, I had some doubt. This is an affair of deep contemplation. From the Tarpeian rock! On the cross! Throwing down the pillar! Contracting for the new paving of the ground! In short, it is quite heroic. He seems to have put an end to that affectation of regret<sup>a</sup>, which was already making daily progress, and which I feared, had it continued, would have been dangerous to our deliverers. I now entirely concur with your letter, and hope for better things; though I cannot bear those persons, who, while they pretend to be friends to peace, support his<sup>a</sup> wicked acts. But all cannot be done at once. Things are beginning to go better than I had expected. I shall not, however, go abroad, till you think I can do it with propriety. I will certainly nowhere be wanting to my Brutus. Even if there were no friendship between us, I would do it in acknowledgment of his great and distinguished virtue. I give up to Pilia my whole house<sup>b</sup>, and all that it contains, being myself on my way to Pompeianum this 1st of May. I wish you would persuade Brutus to occupy my house at Astura<sup>c</sup>.

¶ Dolabella had exerted himself in his capacity of consul to check the forwardness of those who had raised a monument to Caesar, and erected a pillar inscribed "To the father of his country." Some he caused to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock (an ancient form of capital punishment in Rome); others, slaves, he ordered to be crucified; at the same time throwing down the pillar and monument, and ordering the ground on which they stood to be new paved.

LETTER XVI.

I SEND this letter the 3d of May on the point of embarking from the Cluvian gardens in a row-boat, after having put our dear Pilia in possession of my house on the Lucrine lake, with the servants and purveyors. The same day I threaten our friend Petus's potted cheese<sup>d</sup>, and proceed in a few days to Pompeianum; whence I shall afterwards return by sea to these royal<sup>e</sup> domains of Puteoli and Cumæ. O places greatly to be desired in all other respects! but from the number of troublesome visitors almost to be shunned. But to come to the point; how noble is this conduct of my Dolabella! What matter it affords for contemplation! For my part, I do not cease to praise and to encourage him. You do well to inform me in all your letters, what you think of the thing itself, and what of the man. Our friend Brutus, I suppose, might now wear even a golden crown in the middle of the forum. For who would dare to insult him, with a cross, or the Tarpeian rock<sup>f</sup> before his eyes? Especially amidst such great applause and approbation of the lowest people. Now, my Atticus, resolve me of my doubts. I should like, when I have fully satisfied Brutus, to make an excursion into Greece. It is of great moment to Cicero, or rather to me, or I may say to both of us, that I should look upon him in his studies. For Leonidas's letter, which you sent me, affords me no great satisfaction. I shall never be content with commendations such as these; "as things are at present." It is the testimony of one who feels no confidence, but rather mistrust. I had desired Herodes to write to me in detail; but I have hitherto heard nothing from him. I fear he may have had nothing which he thought would give me pleasure to hear. I am much obliged to you for having written to Xeno; for my duty and reputation, are both concerned in his having no want unsupplied. I hear that Flamma Flaminicus is in Rome. I have written to him to say that I had desired you to speak with him about the business of Montanus<sup>g</sup>; and I shall be glad if you will take care that my letter is delivered to him; and will yourself, at your convenience, have some conversation with him. I conceive if the man has any sense of shame, he will provide against the possibility of any expense being incurred on his account. You have acted very kindly towards me in letting me know that Attica was well, before I knew of her indisposition.

LETTER XVII.

I CAME to Pompeianum the 3d of May, having the day preceding, as I before wrote you word, established Pilia in Cumanum. There, whilst I was at dinner, your letter was delivered to me, which you had given to your freed-man Demetries, the 30th of last month. In this are contained many things prudently done, yet such that, as you yourself observe, every design appears subject to the control of fortune. Upon these subjects, therefore, we can only speak as occasion offers, and when we are together. Respecting the affair of Bothrotum, I wish I may have an opportunity of seeing Antonius, which will be a great step. But it is not expected that he will deviate from the Capuan road, whither I fear he is gone to the great prejudice of the republic<sup>h</sup>. L. Cæsar<sup>i</sup>, whom I saw yesterday at Naples very far from well, was of the same opinion. This business must therefore be entered upon, and completed on the 1st of June<sup>j</sup>. But enough of this. Young Quintus has written a most bitter letter to his father, who received it upon our arrival at Pompeianum. The substance of it was that he would not tolerate Aquillia as his step-mother. That however might perhaps be borne. But what think you of this? That from Cæsar he had received everything; nothing from his father; and for what was to come he looked to Antonius. How lost to all sense of honour! But I will think what can be done. I have written letters to our friend Brutus, to Cassius, and to Dolabella; of which I send you copies; not with a view to deliberate about sending them, for I am clearly of opinion they should be sent; but because I doubt not that you will agree with me. I beg you, my Atticus, to supply my son with what you think right, and to allow me to lay this burden upon you. I am very thankful for what you have hitherto done. That unpublished work of mine<sup>k</sup> has not yet been polished, as I designed. What you wish to have interwoven in it requires another separate volume. But, believe me, I think there was less danger in speaking against those wicked practices during the life of the tyrant than since his death. For he somehow bore with me surprisingly. Now,

I have seen nobody—and t with numbers every day; for there are a many excellent men who come into these on account of their health, besides many of ends from the neighbouring towns; all of while they extol you to the skies with the t praises, presently return the greatest to me. For they say they cannot doubt at it is in consequence of my instructions vice that you show yourself so excellent a , and so distinguished a consul. To whom, I might most truly reply, that what you do, from your own judgment and inclination, at you need nobody's advice; yet I neither assent, lest I should seem to lessen your if it were all owing to my counsels; neither wrongly deny it; for, you know, I am more ough covetous of glory. Besides, it is not ming your dignity (what was thought able to Agamemnon himself, the king of to have some Nestor in forming your s; while to me it is most glorious that you, consul, should flourish in praises as the f my institution. duced such an accession to my love, that I wondered there should have been any room for the increase of what seemed already at the full. Who would have thought that any addition could have been made to the love I bare you? Yet such is the addition, that I seem to myself now at length to love, before only to have liked. Why, then, should I exhort you to regard your own dignity and glory? Should I propose to you the examples of eminent men, as they do who use exhortations? I have nobody to propose more eminent than yourself. It is yourself you must imitate; with yourself you must contend. It is not allowable for you now, after such noble deeds, not to be like yourself. Which being the case, exhortation is needless. We ought rather to congratulate you. For that has happened to you which has happened I believe to nobody else, that the utmost severity of punishment has not only been inflicted without exciting ill-will, but has even been popular; and, while it has gratified every good man, it has likewise pleased every one of the lowest class. If this were the effect of chance, I would congratulate your good fortune; but it is the effect of your own greatness of mind, your understanding, and judgment. For I have read your speech, than which nothing can be more prudent. So step by step have you gone back to the cause of what was done, and again returned from it; that the case itself, by the confession of everybody, was ripe for your animadversion. You have saved therefore both the city from danger, and the state from fear; and have conferred a benefit not merely temporary, but of lasting example. You ought, consequently, to understand that the republic reposes on you; and that those persons, from whom it has derived a commencement of liberty, are by you not only to be protected, but rewarded with honours. But on these matters I hope very soon to say more in person. Since it is you who preserve the republic and us, take especial care, my Dolabella, of our own safety.

LETTER XVIII.

You repeatedly attack me because I appear too extravagantly to extol this action of Dolabella's. But while I certainly approve of what has been done, I have been led by more than one of your letters to this high strain of commendation. Dolabella, however, has wholly forfeited your opinion by the same cause, which has likewise made me very much his enemy. The modest man! He ought to have paid the 1st of January, and he has not paid yet; though he was set free from an enormous debt by the hand of Faberius<sup>o</sup>, and begged from him the assistance of Ops<sup>p</sup>. For it is allowable to jest, that you may not think me too much disturbed. It was early on the 8th that I sent my letter; and I received yours the evening of the same day in Pompeianum, by a quick conveyance of two days. But, as I sent you word the very same day, I wrote a sharp letter to Dolabella; and if this has no effect, yet I apprehend he will not resist my personal application. I imagine you have settled the Alban account. What you have furnished me from the Patulcian account is most acceptable, and like everything you do. I thought Eros, whom I had left, was made for settling such affairs, which have got into confusion by his great mismanagement. But I must see about this with him. You will take upon yourself, as I have often mentioned to you, the whole concern of Montanus's business. I am not at all surprised at Servius's desponding conversation with you at the time of his departure; nor do I in any respect yield to him in despondency. If our friend Brutus, that excellent man, does not go into the senate on the 1st of June, I do not understand what he means to do in the forum. But he knows best. By what I perceive to be going on, I judge there has not been much gained by the 15th of March. Therefore I think daily more and more about going into Greece. For I do not see how I can be of any use to my Brutus, who, as you say, is himself thinking of leaving the country. I am not at all satisfied with Leonidas's letter. Respecting Herodes, I agree with you. I should like to have read Saufeius's<sup>1</sup> account. I design to leave Pompeianum the 10th of May.

<sup>o</sup> This Faberius appears to have been a clerk to Cæsar, and since made a tool of Antonius to insert in Cæsar's instructions what he thought fit. It was by such means that Antonius got possession of Cæsar's money; with some of which he bought Dolabella's concurrence in his schemes.

LETTER XIX.

On the 7th of May while I was in Pompeianum I received two letters from you, one the sixth, the other the fourth day after their dates. I shall reply to them in their order. I am very glad that Barnæus should have delivered my letter to you so seasonably. You will manage with Cassius as you do everything else. How fortunate that I should have written to him upon the very point you advise four days before, and should have sent you a copy of my letter! But while I was in despair about Dolabella's deficiency, or paylessness<sup>2</sup> (to use your own expression), behold Brutus's letter and yours! He is thinking of quitting the country. But I see a different haven<sup>3</sup> nearer to one of my age; into which I should like better to be conveyed, while our Brutus is flourishing, and the republic established. But now, as you say, there is no choice. For you agree with me that my age is unsuitable to arms, especially to those of civil wars. Antonius wrote to me only about Clodius<sup>4</sup>; that my gentleness and kindness was gratifying to himself, and would be a source of great satisfaction to me. But Pansa seems to be outrageous on the subject of Clodius, and likewise on that of Deiotarus; and uses severe language, if you choose to believe him. This, however, is not so well in my mind; that he vehemently reprobates this act of Dolabella's. Respecting those who wore chaplets<sup>5</sup>; your sister's son, upon being accused by his father, wrote in answer, that he had worn a chaplet in honour of Cæsar; and had put it off on account of his mourning; in short, that he was ready to bear every reproach, for that he loved Cæsar even dead. I have written to Dolabella very explicitly, as you wished me to do. I have also written to Sica. I would not put this trouble upon you; and should be sorry to have him angry with you. I know Servius's manner of talking<sup>6</sup>, in which I see more of alarm than of wisdom. But since we are all alarmed, I assent to Servius. Publius<sup>7</sup> has been trifling with you. For Cæcilia<sup>8</sup> has been sent hither by these people to negotiate with me. But I soon persuaded her that what she asked was not only not agreeable to me, but not even admissible. If I see Antonius, I will use all diligence about Buthrotum. I come now to your last letter (though on the subject of Servius I have already replied) that I exalt Dolabella's deed. In truth, I think it could not have been better in such a case, and at such a time. But whatever I attribute to him, I do it from your letters. Yet I agree with you that it would be a better deed, if he paid me what he owes. I wish Brutus would occupy Astura. You commend me for making no determination about going abroad till I see how things are likely to turn out; but I have changed my purpose. However, I shall do nothing till I see you. I am pleased with Attica's returning thanks to me about her mother, to whom I have given up my whole house and stores; and I hope to see her again on the 11th. Give my compliments to Attica; I will take good care of Pilia.

LETTER XX.

I WENT by sea from Pompeianum to my friend Lucullus's on the 10th, where I arrived about 9 o'clock; and upon quitting the vessel I got your letter dated the 7th, which your messenger was said to have carried to Cumænum. The next day I received another through Lucullus about the same hour on which I had arrived; and I received one on the 9th dated from Lanuvium. Hear, therefore, my reply to all of them. In the first place, I am much pleased with what has been done in my concerns respecting both the payment and the business of Albius. But with regard to your Buthrotum, Antonius came to Misenum while I was in Pompeianum; and he had left it again before I heard of his being there. From thence he went to Samnium; so that I can give you little hope of my meeting him. The business of Buthrotum must therefore be managed at Rome. L. Antonius's<sup>9</sup> harangue is quite horrible; Dol-lla's excellent. Now<sup>a</sup> let him keep the money himself if he will but pay it on the 15th. I could be sorry if Tertulla<sup>b</sup> were to miscarry; for Cassius's need to be reared as well as Brutus's should be glad to know what is become of the son<sup>c</sup>, and also of the young Cæsar<sup>d</sup>. I have with your first letter, and come now to the second. About the Quintuses and Buthrotum, as I come, as you say. I am much obliged for your advances to Cicero. You think I am mistaken in supposing that the republic depends upon this; but so it is. It will either cease to exist, it will be preserved by him or his party. To your advice of my sending up<sup>e</sup> a written speech, me, my Atticus, reply by a general maxim on these subjects, in which I am pretty well versed. I never was any poet or orator who thought himself superior to himself. This is the case with bad ones. What do you think then of this, who has both genius and learning? Of me also I have had some experience lately on the subject of his edict. I composed one at your request. I liked mine; he liked his own. Nay, as I had addressed to him my treatise on the style of oratory, which I was induced to do at his earnest solicitation, he wrote word to me only, but to you also, that what I recommended he did not approve. Therefore, leave my body, I beg, to write for himself. "Every man his own wife, mine for me; every one his own, mine for me." I cannot say much for the value of this, being taken from Attilius, a very good poet. I wish only that he<sup>f</sup> may be allowed to dress the people at all; for if he is allowed to do so in the city in safety, the cause is ours. Neither nobody will follow the leader of a new war; or those will follow who may easily be persuaded. I come to the third letter. I am that Brutus and Cassius were pleased with it; and have in consequence written to you again. With regard to their wish that Hirrius may be made better through me; I use my endeavours, and he talks most honourably; he lives and is domesticated with Balbus, who honourably likewise: you must judge what I can do to believe. I see you are greatly pleased with Dolabella; I am exceedingly so. I lived in Pansa in Pompeianum; who quite convinced of his upright sentiments, and his desire of peace; but I see clearly that some people are fit for an occasion of war. I approve of the estimation of Brutus and Cassius. You ask me to upon myself the consideration of what I think they ought to do. But opinions depend on the time; which fluctuates every hour. That of Dolabella's, and this speech in opposition to Antonius, seem to me to have done much. Cause was utterly sinking. Now we appear to have a leader; which is the only thing we towns and all good people want. You of Epicurus, and venture to pronounce that could abstain from politics<sup>g</sup>. Does not the dear look of my Brutus deter you from such language? Q. the son, as you mention, is the right hand of Antonius. Through him therefore we shall easily carry what we wish<sup>h</sup>. If, as you suppose, L. Antonius should bring forward Octavius, I am anxious to know how he will address the people. I write this in haste; for Cassius's messenger is setting off immediately. I am going presently to pay my compliments to Pilia; then by water to feast with Vestorius. Best compliments to Attica.

LETTER XXI.

Soon after I had delivered to Cassius's messenger my letter to you on the 11th, my own messenger arrived, and (what was like a prodigy) without any letter from you. But it presently occurred to me that you must have been at Lanuvium. Eros hastened, that I might get a letter from Dolabella. He did not write about my business<sup>i</sup>, for he had not yet received mine; but it was in answer to that of which I sent a copy to you, and was well expressed. As soon as I had despatched Cassius's messenger, I received a visit from Balbus. Gracious gods! how easily might you perceive his dread of quiet! You know the man, how reserved he is; but yet he spake freely of Antonius's designs, who was going round to the veteran soldiers, to secure the ratification of Cæsar's acts, and to make them swear to enforce them everywhere; for which purpose the Duumviri<sup>j</sup> were to examine them every month. He complained also of his own unpopularity; and his whole conversation showed his attachment to Antonius. In short, there is no relying upon anything<sup>k</sup>. To me it is no longer doubtful that affairs tend to war. For that deed<sup>l</sup> has been done with a manly spirit, but with the prudence of a child. Who did not see that there was left an heir<sup>m</sup> to the kingdom? What could be more absurd? "To fear this; to have no apprehension about the other<sup>n</sup>." Nay, at this very time there are many inconsistencies; as that Pontius's Neapolitan villa should be held by the mother<sup>o</sup> of the tyrant-killer. I must read again and again my "Cato the Elder<sup>p</sup>," which I sent you,—for age makes me peevish; I am out of humour with everything: but my life has had its course<sup>q</sup>, let younger men see to it. You will continue to watch over my concerns as you do. I write or rather dictate this while the dessert is upon the table at Vestorius's. I intend to-morrow to be with Hirrius; and thus forsooth I hope to bring over to the honest party one of the five that are left<sup>r</sup>! It

Pray give my best compliments to Attica. ### LETTER XXII.

HAVING understood from Pilia that a messenger was to be sent to you on the 15th, I have immediately scrawled something. In the first place, then, I wish you to know that I go from hence to Arpinum the 17th of May,—so that hereafter you will direct thither if there is anything, though I shall myself presently be at Rome. But I wish, before I arrive, to find out more accurately what is likely to happen; though I fear my conjectures may prove too true: for it is sufficiently clear what they aim at. My pupil†, who dines with me to-day, is greatly attached to him whom our Brutus stabbed; and, if you ask me, I plainly perceive they dread a state of quiet. This position they hold and openly maintain,—that he who has been killed was a most distinguished man, and that the whole state is thrown into disorder by his death; that what he did would be without effect as soon as we lay aside our fears; that his own clemency was his ruin, without which nothing of the kind could have happened to him. What occurs to me is, that if Pompeius* comes up with a firm army, which is probable, there will certainly be war. The very idea and thought of this disturbs me: for what was formerly allowed to you† will not now be allowed to me. I have not concealed my joy‡; besides, they are fond of charging me with ingratitude. So that what was formerly allowed to you and many others will on no account be allowed. Must I declare myself then, and go into the field? It is better to die a thousand times, especially at this age. The 15th of March, therefore, is not so great a consolation as it was, because of the great blunder that it embraces. Still those young men "by their other well-doings put out this reproach." But if you have any better hope, since you both hear more and are admitted to their counsels, I wish you would write to me, and at the same time consider what I should do about a votive legation§. Many people in these parts warn me not to attend the senate on the first, as soldiers are said to be secretly engaged for that day, and expressly against the conspirators, who, I apprehend, will be safer anywhere than in the senate.

BOOK XV.

LETTER I.

OSAD news of Alexion*. It is not to be believed how much I am afflicted; and that, not on account of what most persons suggest, asking what physician I should employ. For what have I now to do with a physician? Or if I should want one, is there such a scarcity? What I have lost is his affection towards me, his kindness and gentleness. This consideration also affects me; what is not to be feared when so temperate a man, so consummate a physician, is unexpectedly carried off by the violence of disease? For all this the only consolation is, that it is the condition of our birth that we should submit to whatever is incident to humanity. Respecting Antonius, I have already written to say that I had not met with him; for he came to Misenum while I was in Pompeianum, and was gone again before I knew of his arrival. But it happened that Hirtius was with me in Puteolanum when I read your letter. I read it to him, and entered upon the subject. In what relates to the first part† he was not less earnest than myself; and in conclusion he appointed me the arbiter not only of this business but of his whole consulship. With Antonius I will so manage, as to let him understand that if he satisfies me in this affair I will give myself wholly to him. I hope Dolabella is at home‡. Let us come now to our friends§, of whom you say you entertain good expectations in consequence of the moderation of their proclamations. But I learned Hirtius's real sentiments when he left me on the 16th to go from Puteolanum to Naples for the sake of meeting Pansa. For I took him aside and counselled him in favour of peace. He could not deny that he was desirous of peace; but he feared the arms of our friends no less than those of Antonius. He confessed it was not without reason that both parties had a guard; but for his own part he was afraid of the arms of both: in short, there is nothing sound. About young Quintus I agree with you. Your letter to his father was extremely handsome, and could not fail of being most agreeable. I had no difficulty in satisfying Cærellia, who not appear very solicitous<sup>b</sup>; and if she were, surely I should not be so. I am surprised you would have listened at all to the lady<sup>c</sup>, who you was so troublesome to you: for as to my having been well of her before her friends, in the hearing of her three sons and her daughter, "the same one does not always utter the same thing<sup>d</sup>," it is this? What is it that should make me about in an assumed character? Is not old of itself a character sufficiently disgusting? If Brutus requests, that I would go to him privately to the first<sup>e</sup>, he has mentioned also in letter to me, and I may probably do so; but I do not at all tell what he wants: for what counsel I give him who am in need of counsel myself? He has consulted his own immortalisation rather than our tranquillity. The report about the nephew<sup>f</sup> will soon be extinguished. Pray remember to Flamma<sup>g</sup>, if there is anything you can do. Yesterday I sent you a letter as I was going from the forum; and I turned aside to Cumani, where I saw Pilia almost well: I saw her besides the gardens near Cumæ; for she had come to attend me, at which I likewise assisted. Cn. Lucullus, an intimate friend, was carrying his mother to her. That day, therefore, I staid in Sinuessanum, the next morning setting out for Arpinum I left this letter. I have nothing new, however, to you, or to ask you; unless, perhaps, you would follow to be of any consequence. Our father has sent me the speech he delivered at the meeting in the capitol, and has desired me to correct (but not with a view to excite applause) he publishes it. The speech is written with elegance of sentiments and expression, so nothing can exceed it. Yet, if I had had the cause to conduct, I should have treated it more warmly; you see what the subject is, he is the person that speaks. I have, therefore, been unable to correct it; for in the style of our Brutus prefers, and agreeably to his method of the best method of speaking, he has succeeded in this oration that nothing can be more elegant. But I alone, whether rightly or not of a different opinion. I wish, however, you would read the speech,—unless you have already,—and would let me know what you of it; though I fear you may be misled by time<sup>h</sup>, and may be over-attentive in your judgment if you will call to mind the thunders of thesenes, you will understand that what is so lately attic may be strongly expressed. these things when we meet. ## LETTER II.

ON the 18th, on my way from Sinuessanum, after I had sent my letter to you and had proceeded from Cumæ to Viscianum, I received yours from the messenger. There was more than enough in it about Buthrotum. For you do not, nor can you, take a greater interest in that business than I do. It is thus proper for you to attend to my concerns and me to yours. I have accordingly undertaken this so, that I shall esteem nothing of superior obligation<sup>1</sup>. I learned from your letter, and from others, that L. Antonius had made a scurvy harangue; but what was the nature of it I do not know, for you said nothing. About Menedemus<sup>2</sup> it is quite right. Quintus<sup>3</sup> must assuredly be dictating what you write. I am glad you approve of my reason for declining to compose what you asked of me<sup>4</sup>, and you will approve it still more when you have read the speech, about which I wrote to you this morning. What you mention about the legions is perfectly true<sup>5</sup>; but you do not seem sufficiently to have considered what you can hope to have done by the senate in the affair of our Buthrotians. As far as my opinion goes (for I see so much), I do not think we<sup>6</sup> shall long subsist: but even if we are disappointed of this resource<sup>7</sup>, you will not be disappointed about Buthrotum<sup>8</sup>. I feel as you do on the subject of Octavius's speech; and am not pleased with the preparations for his games<sup>9</sup>, and the appointment of Matius and Postumius to conduct them. Salserna<sup>10</sup> is a fit colleague for them. But all these people, as you perceive, are as much afraid of peace as we are of war. I should be glad if I could relieve Balbus from the odium he has incurred<sup>11</sup>; but he does not himself believe it to be possible: therefore he turns his attention elsewhere. I am glad that you derive comfort from the first Tusculan Disquisition; for there is no resource either better or readier<sup>12</sup>. I am not sorry that Flamma speaks so fairly. What may be the case of the Tyndaritan<sup>13</sup>, in which you are so earnest, I know not; yet I will give them my support<sup>14</sup>. These transac-

I am sorry for Alexion; yet having fallen into so severe an illness, I think that he has been kindly dealt with. I should like to know who are his heirs in the second degree<sup>3</sup>, and what is the date of his will.

LETTER III.

I RECEIVED two letters from you on the 22d in Atina, in answer to two of mine. One was dated the 18th, the other the 21st. To the earliest therefore first. Pray come to Tusculanum, as you propose. I mean to be there the 27th. When you say that we must submit to the conquerors, I do not agree with you; for many things appear to me preferable. As to what you recollect to have been done in the temple of Apollo during the consulship of Lentulus and Marcellus<sup>4</sup>; neither the case nor the time is similar; especially as you mention that Marcellus and others are taking their departure. I must therefore find out and determine on the spot, whether I can safely remain in Rome. These new meetings alarm the inhabitants<sup>5</sup>; for we are placed in great straits. But let these things be disregarded; I can look upon still greater with unconcern. I have been made acquainted with Calva's will, a base and sordid fellow. I thank you for the care you take about Demonius's accounts. I have already written very particularly to Dolabella about Marius, if only my letter has been delivered. For his sake I wish him success, as indeed I ought. I come now to the more recent letter. I have learned what I wanted about Alexion<sup>6</sup>. Hirtius is in your interest<sup>7</sup>. I wish Antonius were worse than he is<sup>8</sup>. You mention Quintus the son. A volume of evils! Of the father we will speak when we meet. I am desirous of assisting Brutus in everything I can. I see you entertain the same opinion of his speech that I do. But I do not quite understand what you wish me to write, as if it were a speech delivered by Brutus; when he has himself published his own. How can this be? Would you have it as against a tyrant, who had been justly killed? I shall have much to say, and much to write; but it must be in another manner and time. The tribunes have done well about Cæsar's chair<sup>9</sup>. And excellent the fourteen rows of knights. I am glad Brutus has been at my house, provided he was pleased, and staid as long as he liked.

<sup>8</sup> This must be supposed to relate to some passage in Atticus's letter, where he mentioned that Antonius was ill.

<sup>9</sup> It had been decreed, in flattery to Cæsar, that he should have a gilt chair in the senate and public places. Octavius wished to have this chair placed, in memory of Cæsar, at the games, but the tribunes forbade it; on which account they seem to have been applauded by the knights in the theatre, where they sat in fourteen rows of benches reserved by law for their exclusive use.

LETTER IV.

ON the 23d about two o'clock a messenger arrived from Q. Fufius with a letter containing something about my restoring myself to him<sup>1</sup>; as silly as usual; unless, perhaps, whatever we dislike is apt to appear silly. I replied in a manner that I think you would approve. He brought me two letters from you, one of the 22d, the other the 23d. I shall answer the latter first. "And the legion?" I applaud the circumstance. And if Carfulenus<sup>2</sup> too; the streams, as they say, will run upwards<sup>3</sup>. You take notice of the factious counsels of Antonius. I wish he may act through the populace, rather than through the senate; and I imagine this is likely to be the case. But to me all his measures have a warlike tendency. If indeed Decimus Brutus's province is snatched away, whatever I may think of his strength, it seems impossible to be done without a war. But for this I do not wish, now that assurance<sup>4</sup> is given to the Buthrotians. You may smile; but I am sorry that this should not rather have been accomplished by my attention, diligence and influence. When you say that you do not know what is to become of our friends<sup>5</sup>, the same doubt has long since given me concern; so that the consolation I derived from the 15th of March already appears foolish. For we have shown a manly spirit, but, believe me, a childish prudence. The tree has been cut down, not torn up by the roots; and you see accordingly how it sprouts. Let us have recourse then to the Tusculan Disquisitions, since you often appeal to them. We must endeavour<sup>6</sup> to conceal this from Sausfeius; for my part I will never tell. You say that Brutus has written to inquire on what day I should go to Tusculanum. As I before mentioned to you, the 27th; and I hope to see you there as soon as possible; for I apprehend I shall be obliged to proceed to Lanuvium<sup>7</sup>, where there will be a great deal of talking. But I shall see about it. I revert now to the earlier letter, of which I pass over that first part relative to the Buthrotians, which is lodged in my inmost soul; if only, as you say, there is any opportunity of acting. You seem quite earnest on the subject of Brutus's speech, by urging it again so copiously. Should I then support the same cause for which he has written? should I write without his invitation? No interference can be more disrespectful. But,

<sup>3</sup> The original is a Greek proverbial expression, signifying that it would be beyond all expectation; for Carfulenus had been a firm friend to Cæsar. In fact he did not join Brutus, but Octavius.

<sup>4</sup> May not this refer to the unwarranted assertion of some foolish person saying that he would be unanswerable for the safety of the Buthrotians? which Cicero pleasantly ridicules. Had a war broken out, it might be expected that Antonius would be otherwise employed than in settling soldiers in Buthrotium.

<sup>6</sup> This is said in jest, with reference to Sausfeius's attachment to the sect of Epicurus; while the Tusculan Disquisitions are conducted upon principles totally opposite. It will be remembered that Atticus was also an Epicurean.

you, something in the manner of Heraclides<sup>1</sup>. that indeed I do not object; but the subject is well considered, and we must wait for a season of writing. For, whatever you may think of me, (and I should certainly wish you to think the best possible,) if things remain as they are, (you will bear what I am going to say,) the 15th of March affords me no satisfaction. For would never have returned; and we should not have been compelled by fear to confirm his acts. to adopt Saufeius's maxims<sup>2</sup>, and renounce Tuscan Disquisitions to which you also (Vestorius?) so gracious towards me was he, even dead may the gods confound!) that, we have not by his death regained our liberty, was no reason, at my age, to dislike him for auster. I blush, believe me. But I have already said, and will not erase it. I could have wished report about Menedemus had been true; and that about the queen may be so. The rest we meet; especially what measures our friends should pursue; what also ourselves, if Cæsar means to beset the senate with soldiers. I have given this letter to his messenger, I was hoping he might open it. I have therefore sent on the messenger for yours required an answer. How much I wish you could have given Brutus assistance! I will therefore write to him. I sent Tiro to Dolabella with a letter and instructions. Desire him to come to you; and if he has anything to say, write what you please. See here! most provokingly, L. Cæsar begs that you go to him at The Grove<sup>3</sup>, or to let him know where he may find me; for Brutus would have some conversation with me. A useless and fruitless job! I think however I will go, and from thence to Rome, unless I change my present purpose. I send you this in few words, there is yet nothing from Balbus. I am therefore expecting to hear from you, and not only what can be done, but also what will be done.

LETTER V.

A messenger that went to Brutus has brought letters from him and Cassius. They earnestly give my opinion; Brutus, indeed, which of the maxims<sup>4</sup> he should adopt. A sad state of affairs! I positively nothing to say, and therefore of maintaining silence, unless you suggest anything different. But if anything occurs to Cæsar would probably never have returned safe from the Parthian expedition. This appears to be said in reference to the actual danger of the war, which had already been fatal to Crassus's army; and partly in reference to the unstable and invidious nature of Cæsar's power. See book x. letter 8.

you, pray write. Cassius strongly begs and entreats me to make a good citizen of Hirtius. Do you think he is in his senses? 'Tis the fuller and the coals<sup>5</sup>. I send you his letter. What you say respecting a decree of the senate for the provinces of Brutus and Cassius<sup>6</sup>, is repeated by Balbus and by Hirtius; and the latter purposes himself to bring it on; for he is already in Tusculanum. He strongly advises me to keep away. He does this on account of the danger, which he says threatened him also. But for my part, even if there were no danger, I am so far from caring to prevent Antonius' suspicions of my dissatisfaction at his success, that the wish of avoiding him is of itself a reason why I am unwilling to go to Rome. Our friend Varro has sent me a letter, which he received from I know not whom (for he had erased the name), in which it was mentioned, that those veteran soldiers, whose claims<sup>7</sup> were rejected, (for some of them were dismissed,) talked very seditiously; so that whoever was thought to have opposed their interests, would be in great danger at Rome. Besides, how should I manage my going, my returning, my countenance, my step, amongst that party<sup>8</sup>. And if, as you say, L. Antonius is to go against Decimus<sup>9</sup>, the rest against our friends<sup>10</sup>, what should I do? or how should I conduct myself? I have therefore determined, as matters now stand, to absent myself from that city in which I have not only flourished with the highest dignity, but have enjoyed some share of it even under subjection. Yet I am not so much resolved to go out of Italy, (upon which I must deliberate with you,) as not to go up thither<sup>11</sup>.

LETTER VI.

Our friend Brutus has written to me, and likewise Cassius, that I might use my authority to secure Hirtius, whom they knew to have been hitherto well affected, though they could not entirely depend upon him. For I apprehend he is displeased with Antonius, but still attached to that cause. However, I wrote, recommending to him the dignity of Brutus and Cassius; and wish you to be acquainted with his answer, in case you should draw from it the same conclusion as I do, that the opposite party are even now afraid of our friends' possessing more spirit than they really have.

"Hirtius to his Cicero.

"You ask if I am yet returned from the country; or whether, at a time when everybody is in activity, I am amusing myself in idleness. I likewise have quitted the city; for I thought it more useful to absent myself. I write this setting off to Tusculanum. appointments being provided for so many years. As Brutus and Cassius may obtain anything of me through you, so I wish that by you they may as easily be induced to enter into no intemperate counsels. For you say that, at the time they wrote to you, they were retiring. Whither? or wherefore? Stop them, I beseech you, Cicero; and suffer not all these things to perish, which must be utterly ruined by plunder, by fire, by slaughter. Only, if they have any cause of fear, let them be upon their guard; but let them attempt nothing more. In good truth they will gain no more by violent counsels than by gentle ones, provided they are prudent. For this state of things, which is passing on, is not of a nature to last; but by opposition it presently assumes a power of doing mischief. Write to me in Tusculanum, and let me know what hopes you have of them."

This is Hirtius's letter; to which I replied, that they entertained no intemperate designs; and this I confidently affirmed. This, such as it is, I wished you to know. Since sealing my letter I have heard from Balbus that Servilia had returned, and confirmed the opinion that they would not go out of the country. I am now expecting a letter from you.

LETTER VII.

I THANK you for the letters you sent me, which indeed gave me much pleasure; especially that of our friend Sextus<sup>b</sup>. You will say, "because he commends you." I think indeed that may be one reason; but yet before I came to that part, I was exceedingly pleased both with his sentiments in regard to the republic, and with the accuracy of his writing. The peace-maker Servius<sup>c</sup>, with his little clerk, seems to have acted as an ambassador, and to be afraid of any captious proceeding. But he ought to have considered, that "it was no struggle of right," but what follows<sup>d</sup>. Let me hear also from you.

LETTER VIII.

AFTER you left me I received two letters from Balbus; no news. Also one from Hirtius, who represents himself to be highly offended with the conduct of the veteran troops. I am anxious to know what they will do about the first of March*. I have therefore sent Tiro, and several others with him, that whatever happens you may write to me by one of them. I have besides written to Antonius about an honorary legation, lest being an irritable man, he might be offended had I applied only to Dolabella. But as he is said to be difficult of access, I have written to Eutrapelus to present my letter to him, as having occasion for such an appointment. A votive legation is more honourable; but I may make use of both<sup>f</sup>. Again and again I beg you to take care of yourself. I wish you could come to me; but if you cannot, we will attain the same end by letter. Gracchus sends me word, that C. Cassius had informed him there were men provided to be sent armed to Tusculanum. This does not appear to me probable; but yet it is right to be upon one's guard, and to go about from one villa to another<sup>g</sup>. To-morrow will produce something to direct us in the consideration of this business.

LETTER IX.

ON the evening of the third I received a letter from Balbus, saying that the senate was to meet on the 5th, for the purpose of appointing Brutus in Asia, Cassius in Sicily, to purchase corn for the use of the city. Wretched business! first, that they should receive any commission from these people; then, if any, that it should be such a lieutenant's commission<sup>h</sup>. I know not if it is better than sitting by the Eurotas<sup>i</sup>. But these things chance must govern. He says that at the same time a decree is to be passed for the allotment of the provinces to them, and to the rest of prætorian rank. This certainly is better than that Persic<sup>j</sup> portico. For I would not have that distant Lacedæmon supposed to mean Lanuvium. Do you laugh, you will say, in such a state of affairs! What should I do? I am tired of weeping. Immortal gods! how the first page of your letter disturbed me! But what was that collision of arms in your house? I am glad however that this storm soon passed over. I am anxious to know what you have done with your commission<sup>k</sup>, at once so sad and difficult of consultation. For it is indeed quite inextricable; so beset are we by all the troops. As for me, Brutus's letter, which you say you have read, has so disturbed me, that though I was before at a loss, yet I am become duller than ever through <sup>f</sup> A votive legation granted by the two consuls, and an honorary lieutenantancy from Dolabella. A votive legation was a nominal appointment in discharge of a vow. See letter I of this book.

<sup>g</sup> To avoid being surprised. It should be mentioned, however, that the text in this place is very doubtful. In the Epist. ad Fam. xi. 20. D. Brutus admonishes Cicero to be upon his guard—cautum, et insidias vitantes.

<sup>h</sup> During the time of their prætorship it is probable they could not be sent abroad but by some commission of this kind, which may have been devised by the friends of peace.

<sup>i</sup> The Eurotas was a river of Lacedæmon. The expression is probably a proverbial one, signifying, "to remain inactive," as Brutus and Cassius were doing at Lanuvium. The Romans used to give great names to their canals:—"ductus aquarum isti Nilos et Euripos vocant."—De Leg. ii. 1.

<sup>j</sup> Having previously applied the name of Eurotas to the stream that flowed by Lanuvium, he goes on in the same figure of speech to call the portico of Lanuvium by the name of a portico at Lacedæmon; and concludes ironically, that he would not have Atticus suppose him to mean Lanuvium; thus humorously giving the true interpretation of his own metaphor.

<sup>k</sup> Atticus appears to have been solicited to go to Lanuvium for the purpose of advising with his friend Brutus in the present difficult situation. See letter 10 of this book.

* Caesar, preparatory to his Parthian expedition, had nominated the magistrates for several years in advance.

<sup>b</sup> This is generally supposed to mean Sextus Peduceus, of whom mention is made, book vii. letter 13, and book x. letter 1.

<sup>c</sup> Servius Sulpicius, a distinguished lawyer, who may perhaps on that account be represented as attended by his clerk. He is mentioned before. See book x. letter 14.

<sup>e</sup> Commentators have not without reason suspected some error of the text. It ought probably to be written "the 1st of June." If that is not the case, it must relate to something no longer understood.

ress of mind<sup>1</sup>. But I will write more when I informed of what has been done. At present we nothing to say, and the less, because I am bful if you will get this letter. For it is certain whether the messenger will see you. I very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER X.

ow affectionately is Brutus's letter written ! unlucky this time, when you are prevented going to him ! But what can I write<sup>2</sup> ? did I advise him to accept the offer of these le ? What more disgraceful ? To attempt any ; They dare not, neither can they. Come, should I advise them to remain quiet ? Who answer for their safety ? And if any violent ures are adopted with regard to Decimus, will become of our friends, even if nobody to molest them ? Not to celebrate the s<sup>3</sup> ? What more dishonourable ? To exact ! How does it differ from that appointment ion<sup>4</sup> ? Or what office in the state is more mptible ? In such a situation of things, el is not safe even for the person who gives his however I might disregard, if I were any good. But to enter upon it without any ect of advantage ; while he listens to the or even the entreaties of his mother, why I interfere ? I will however think what kind er I can write ; for I cannot bear to be silent. presently send therefore either to Antium Circæi<sup>5</sup>.

LETTER XI.

AME to Antium on the 26th. Brutus was glad me. Afterwards in the presence of several s, and of Servilia<sup>6</sup>, Tertulla<sup>7</sup>, and Portia<sup>8</sup>, ed what I thought. Favonius also was there. meditated upon this as I went along, and as my opinion that he should accept this ommission in Asia ; that nothing now rel for us to do but to secure ourselves ; in was involved the protection also of the c itself. After I had entered into this dis-

Cassius came in ; upon which I repeated ne sentiments. At this place Cassius with ed looks (you would say Mars himself was ng) declared he would not go into Sicily.

I accept an offer which is intended as an "What then do you propose to do ?"

To which he replied, that he would go eece. "And what," said I, "will you do, ?" "I will go to Rome," said he, "if you t." "But I do by no means advise it, for not be safe." "But if I could be safe, ou then approve it ?" "So much so that not have you go away at all, neither at e, nor into a province after your pretorship. o not advise you to trust yourself in the I added what will readily occur to you, why I not be safe. A great deal was then said, probable that Atticus may have asked Cicero's and especially by Cassius, complaining of the oppor- tunities which had been lost ; and he heavily accused Decimus. I said we ought not to dwell upon what<sup>1</sup> was past ; though at the same time I agreed with him. And having entered upon the consideration of what ought to have been done ; without however saying anything new or anything more than is said every day ; (for I did not touch upon the subject of having omitted to strike anybody else<sup>2</sup> ; ) but only that the senate ought to have been assembled, and the people more powerfully excited while their affections were yet warm : "It is taking the man- agement of the whole republic," exclaims your female friend ; "this I never heard anybody advance." I checked myself<sup>3</sup>. At length Cassius seemed disposed to go into Sicily ; (for Servilia engaged that the mention of the corn should be expunged from the decree ; ) and our friend<sup>4</sup> was soon driven from that idle<sup>5</sup> talk ; for he said that he acquiesced. He determined therefore that the games should be celebrated in his name, but without his being present. And he appeared will- ing to proceed into Asia from Antium. Not to tire you ; I had no satisfaction in that visit, besides the consciousness of having done my duty. For it was not to be suffered that he should leave Italy without my seeing him. Excepting for this debt of affection and kindness, I might say to myself— "What is the use of your coming hither, O prophet<sup>6</sup> ?" I found the vessel<sup>7</sup> shattered, or rather gone to pieces. Nothing was done with wisdom, nothing with prudence, nothing with regularity. So that if I before did not hesitate, yet still less do I now hesitate to fly away from hence ; and that as soon as possible ; "where I may hear neither of the deeds nor the name of the Pelopidæ<sup>8</sup>." But while I think of it, let me inform you that Dolabella has appointed me his lieutenant from the 2d of April<sup>9</sup>. I was told of it yesterday even- ing. A votive appointment you did not like ; and indeed it was absurd, that having bound myself by vows "if the republic should subsist," I should now discharge them when it is overturned. Besides, the honorary legations have, I think, a definite period by the Julian law ; and it is not easy to a legation of this kind<sup>4</sup> to add leave to go in and out when you please ; which is now granted to me. And the right which this licence gives me for five years is charming. Though why should I think of five years ? The business appears to me to be con- tracted within a little space<sup>5</sup>. But let me not utter ill omens.

<sup>9</sup> It is uncertain whether there is any error in this date, or whether there may have been some reason for the com- mission being antedated.

LETTER XII.

THIS is good news about Buthrotum. But I had already sent Tiro with a letter<sup>1</sup> to Dolabella as you desired. What harm? I thought I had written sufficiently distinctly about our friends at Antium<sup>2</sup>, that you needed not to doubt of their remaining quiet, and accepting Antonius's insulting offer. Cassius scorned the business of the corn, which Servilia engaged to get expunged from the decree of the senate. But our friend<sup>3</sup>, with all his dignity, said he would go into Asia, after he had agreed with me that he could not safely reside in Rome. For he thought it better to exhibit the games without being present. He was collecting vessels, and preparing for his passage. In the mean time they designed to remain in the same neighbourhood. Brutus talked of going to Astura<sup>4</sup>. L. Antonius kindly indeed by letter desires me not to make myself uneasy<sup>5</sup>. I acknowledge this as one favour received; and may perhaps receive a second, unless he should come to Tusculanum. How intolerable are these negotiations<sup>6</sup>! which however are tolerated<sup>7</sup>. Which of Brutus's party<sup>8</sup> is to blame for this<sup>9</sup>? There is, I am persuaded, no want of sense, no want of spirit in Octavianus<sup>10</sup>; and he seemed to be affected as we could wish towards our heroes. But it is matter of deep consideration what reliance can be placed on his age, his name<sup>11</sup>, his succession, his education. His stepfather<sup>12</sup>, whom I saw at Astura, thought he was not to be trusted. But he must be cherished however, if for no other reason, that he may be disunited from Antonius. It is well done of Marcellus, if he directs our own's own<sup>13</sup>; who seemed to me to be much attached to him. He<sup>14</sup> did not place much reliance on Pansa and Hirtius. They<sup>15</sup> have a good natural disposition, if it is but firm<sup>16</sup>.

<sup>4</sup> To Cicero's house. See letter 3 of this book, and book xiv. letter 19.

<sup>8</sup> So the word Bruti is to be understood. See book xiv. letter 14.

<sup>10</sup> The same who is before called Octavius; but his adoption into Caesar's family having been confirmed, he took the name of C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, that of Augustus being added afterwards.

<sup>16</sup> He intimates the same thing in letters 1 and 6 of this book, and again in letter 22. I know not if any apology might be expected for giving a new interpretation to the concluding sentences of this letter. Suffice it to say, that I was dissatisfied with the explanation of former commentators, and always incline to resist the itch of conjectural emendations, the offspring of idleness and vanity. At the same time I should add, that both Middleton and Mongault apply this to Octavianus.

LETTER XIII.

ON the 24th I received two letters from you. I shall reply to the earliest first. I agree with you that I should neither take the lead, nor close the rear; but should nevertheless favour them<sup>1</sup>. I have sent you my speech, and leave the keeping and the publication of it to your discretion. But when shall we see the time that you will think it may be produced? I do not understand how the truce you mention can possibly take place. It is better to use no opposition; which is the policy I mean to adopt. When you say that two legions have arrived at Brundisium, you get all information first<sup>2</sup>: write me word therefore of everything you hear. I am expecting Varro's Dialogue. I now approve of undertaking something in the manner of Heracles<sup>3</sup>, especially as you anticipate it with so much delight: but I wish to know of what kind you would have it. As I mentioned to you before, or formerly, (since you prefer this expression,) you have, to tell you the truth<sup>4</sup>, made me the more desirous of writing, by adding to your own opinion, which was well known to me, the authority of Peduceus, which is always great, and of the first weight with me. I will endeavour therefore to prevent your charging me either with idleness, or want of attention. Vectenus and Faberius I cherish, as you advise. I suspect Clælius of no evil design, although—But what has he done? On the subject of maintaining our freedom, than which assuredly nothing is sweeter, I agree with you. Behave so to Gallus Caninius: The wicked man<sup>5</sup>! What else can I call him? Should I call him the cautious Marcellus? Such would I call myself; yet not so very cautious. I have now replied to your longer and earlier letter; but what shall I reply to the shorter and more recent one, except that it was most delicious? The news from Spain is excellent. Might I but see my Balbilus<sup>6</sup> safe, the support of my old age. I may say the same of Annianus, considering the attraction I receive from Visellia<sup>7</sup>. But these things are subject to the lot of human nature. You say that you know nothing of Brutus; but Selicia informs me that M. Scaptius<sup>8</sup> is arrived, and that he is to come to her, not with any display, but privately; and that I should know everything; which I will immediately communicate to you. In the mean time you mention, in the same letter, that a servant of Bassus is come, who brings intelligence of the Alexandrian legions being in arms; that Bassus is sent for<sup>9</sup>, and Cassius is expected. What say you?

<sup>2</sup> Though Cicero was now in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, and consequently much nearer to Brundisium, yet news from thence had arrived at Rome before it reached him.

<sup>5</sup> This appears to me to relate to Marcellus, whatever he may have done; otherwise I see not how the following expression, cautum Marcellum, should come to be in the accusative case, unless indeed it be copied from Atticus.

republic seems to be recovering its rights. We must not presume beforehand. You know the steadiness of these troops<sup>d</sup>, and their habits under. Dolabella is the best of men. Though I am writing at my dessert, I hear that he is himself to Baie, yet he wrote to me from Capri a letter, which I received upon quitting Bath, saying that he had done everything to the best about the payment. He accuses Vectenus of flattery, as such people are accustomed to do; adds that my friend Sestius has taken the whole stress upon himself. He is an excellent man, very much attached to me; yet I want to know Sestius should be able to do in this affair than any one of us. If however there should be anything beyond my expectation, you will take to inform me. But if, as I imagine, it is a case, you will nevertheless write; for such a stance will not affect me. Here I amuse myself with philosophical speculations, (for what am I to do?) and copiously explain what relates to duty, addressing myself to Cicero. For on this subject can a father more properly speak to a son? Afterwards I shall proceed to something else.

In short, there shall remain some fruit of my excursion. Varro was expected to-day or to-morrow. But I am hastening away to Pompeia, not that anything can be more beautiful than the place; but there I shall be less molested by the sea. Pray let me know what accusation is laid at in the case of Myrtilus, who I hear has deserved punishment; and whether it is quite clear that he was corrupted. While I write this, I imagine the speech will just have been delivered. I am almost afraid to hear what you may say of it. Though how does it concern me, if it comes out till the republic is restored? which what are my hopes? I dare not

LETTER XIV.

On the 26th I received a letter from Dolabella, which I send you a copy. In this he says that he has done everything that you could wish. I lately wrote to him in return with the fullest expression of my thanks. But that he might not be surprised at my writing twice on the same subject, I gave it as a reason, that I had not before been able to have any personal communication with him. Not to detain you, the following is a copy of the letter:—

Having before heard by letter from my friend of your great liberality and extreme kindness towards him; and having it also under your hand, you that had done what we desired, I express my thanks to you in such terms, that you might understand you could not have done upon me a greater favour. But Atticus since comes himself to me at Tusculanum for a single purpose of returning you his thanks, and for the extraordinary attention and goodness he had experienced from you in the present affair; I could not refrain from repeating what seems the most natural interpretation, though corrected by commentators; who have followed each in applying the words to Antonius and his party. saying that he had no hope at all, but avoided the saying so.

ing the same to you more distinctly in this letter. For of all the marks of your affection and civility towards me, my Dolabella, which are very great, let me assure you that I esteem this the highest and most grateful, by letting Atticus see my regard for you, and yours for me. For the rest, though the settlement of Buthrotum has been your work, and we are naturally inclined to support the fruits of our own exertion, yet I wish again and again to recommend both the cause and the city to your patronage, that you may be pleased to cover it with your authority and assistance. You will confer a lasting security on the Buthrotians; and will save Atticus and me from much trouble and anxiety, if for my honour's sake you will let them always remain under your protection. Which again and again I earnestly entreat you to do.”

Having finished this letter, I devoted myself to my compositions, which I fear may in several places call for your little red marks<sup>f</sup>, so discomposed am I, and occupied with deep thoughts.

LETTER XV.

CONFOUND L. Antonius! if he molests the Buthrotians. I have drawn up my attestation<sup>g</sup>, which you may countersign when you please. If L. Fadius the ædile demands the money belonging to the people of Arpinum, deliver up even the whole of it. (I wrote to you in a former letter about the 110 æstertia (900*l*.) which were to be provided for Statius<sup>h</sup>.) If therefore Fadius asks for it, I wish it to be given to him; but to nobody besides Fadius. I think there is some other deposit at my house, which I have written to Eros to give back<sup>i</sup>. The queen<sup>k</sup> I hate. Ammonius, the voucher of her promises, knows that I am justified in what I do. They<sup>l</sup> were all connected with learning and becoming my character, so that I should not mind declaring them in the public assembly. Sara, independently of my knowing him to be a bad man, was besides insolent to me. For once only I saw him in my house, when asking him civilly what he wanted, he said he came to look for Atticus. But of the haughtiness of the queen herself, when she was in the gardens on the other side of the Tiber, I cannot speak without great pain. Let me, then, have nothing to do with such people, who seem to think not so much that I have no spirit, as that I have scarcely common feeling. Eros's mismanagement, as I conceive, is an obstacle in the way of my going abroad. For while I ought to have abundance, from the balance which he drew the fifth of April, I am under the necessity of borrowing. And what was received from the produce of my estate, I supposed to have been laid by for that temple<sup>m</sup>. But <sup>i</sup> Statius appears to have been a freed-man of Q. Cicero. See book v. letter 1; and book xv. letter 19.

<sup>m</sup> In which he proposed to consecrate his daughter's memory. See book xii. letter 18, &c.

I have given instructions about these matters to Tiro, whom I have sent to Rome on that account. I did not care to trouble you, who had already trouble enough. The more modest my Cicero is, the more I feel for him. For upon this subject he mentioned nothing to me, to whom he ought particularly to have written; but he wrote to Tiro to say, that since the first of April, when the year ends, he had received nothing. You were always of opinion, agreeably to your natural disposition, and thought also that it concerned my dignity, that he should have from me not only a liberal, but also a handsome and ample allowance. Therefore I wish you would manage (what I can transact through nobody else, or I would not trouble you), that there may be paid by exchanges at Athens what is sufficient for his yearly expenses. Eros will furnish the money for this purpose. I send up Tiro; therefore you will<sup>a</sup> be so good as to take care about it, and write me word if anything occurs to you upon the subject.

LETTER XVI.

At length a messenger is arrived from Cicero with a letter written, in good truth, after the ancient manner<sup>a</sup>, which of itself shows some degree of proficiency. Other people likewise give me good accounts. Leonidas, however, still uses the same expression of "hitherto". But Herodes gives him the highest commendations. What think you? Though these should prove mere words, I am gratified to receive them on this subject, and gladly become a credulous hearer. If you have heard anything from Statius that concerns me, I should be glad to be informed of it. I assure you this place<sup>b</sup> is beautiful, and quite retired; and, if you wish to write anything, free from interruption. But I know not how it is, "Sweet home". Accordingly my steps revert to Tusculanum<sup>c</sup>. For, after all, this rude scene would soon grow tiresome. I am besides afraid of the rains, if my prognostics<sup>d</sup> are true; for the frogs are exercising their rhetoric. I beg you to let me know where, and on what day, I can see our friend Brutus.

LETTER XVII.

I RECEIVED two letters on the 14th, one dated that day, and one the day before. Therefore to the earliest first. You will inform me about Brutus, when you know yourself. I had heard of the pretended alarm of the consuls<sup>e</sup>; for Sica, very affectionately indeed, but with unnecessary agitation, brought me an account of that suspicion. But what is it you say, "that we must be content with what is offered?"<sup>f</sup> For not a word has been

mentioned by Siregius<sup>g</sup>. I am not pleased with this. I have been vexed about your neighbour Pletorius, that anybody should have heard it before me. You have acted quite right in the case of Syrus. I imagine you will easily stop L. Antonius<sup>h</sup> through his brother Marcus. I forbade the money to be given to Antro, or to anybody, except<sup>i</sup> L. Fadius the ædile; but you had not then received the letter. It cannot either safely or properly be done otherwise. With regard to the deficiency of 100 sestertia (800*l.*) to be provided for Cicero, I should wish you to inquire of Eros what is become of the rent of the houses<sup>j</sup>. I am not displeased with Arabio's conduct in the affair of Sittius. About my journey I think nothing, till I have settled my accounts<sup>k</sup>; in which I believe you agree with me. I have replied to your first letter: now hear what I have to say to the other. You act as you always do, in assisting Servilia, that is Brutus<sup>l</sup>. I am glad you do not trouble yourself about the queen, and especially that you approve of my conduct. I have been informed by Tiro of the state of Eros's accounts, and have sent for him. I am much obliged by your engaging that Cicero shall be in no want. I hear great things of him from Memmius, who called upon me on his return from them<sup>m</sup> at Lanuvium. And indeed his own letter is so affectionately and classically written, that I might read it to a public audience, for which I think he deserves the more indulgence. Sestius, I imagine, is not sorry about Buciliannus<sup>n</sup>. If Tiro comes to me, I think of going to Tusculanum. But I beg you to inform me without delay whatever happens which it may concern me to know.

LETTER XVIII.

THOUGH I thought I had sufficiently explained to you on the 15th what I wanted, and what I wished you to do if it was convenient to you; yet after I had set out, and was passing over the lake<sup>o</sup>, I determined to send Tiro to you, that he might be present at the transactions<sup>p</sup> which were in agitation. And I have also written to Dolabella to <sup>t</sup> This may possibly allude to the houses mentioned book xii. letter 32, from the rents of which he proposed to defray his son's expenses at Athens.

<sup>u</sup> In the text is inserted a Greek letter, the meaning of which has been much disputed. It seems to me most probable that it is used for "accounts," being the first letter of the word λόγος.

Nepos's life of Atticus, amounting to 100 sestertia, or 800*l.* From the same author it appears, that after Brutus was in Ephrus, he sent him another present of 300 sestertia, or 2400*l.* <sup>w</sup> The conspirators.

LETTER XIX.

AT further attempt<sup>3</sup> is to be made in the f the Buthrotians? For you mention that ave been waiting in vain. And what does say of himself? I patient to hear from you. Pray see that ; is done<sup>4</sup> rashly. Statius has written to say that Q. Cicero had strongly affirmed to conversation that he could not bear these lings, and that he was resolved to go over to and Cassius. I want now to understand or what it means I am unable to explain. y design something in a fit of passion against us; he may aim at some new glory; it may a sudden impulse; and assuredly so it is. t I have my fears; and his father is much ed; for he knows what that person<sup>5</sup> formerly ro being appointed his lieutenant was obliged to Dolabella's sanction.

said of him to me; things not to be revealed. In short, I do not know what he is at. I am to re- ceive from Dolabella such despatches<sup>6</sup> as I please; that is, none at all. Tell me; did C. Antonius wish to be made a septemvir<sup>7</sup>? He was undoubt- edly worthy<sup>8</sup> of it. It is, as you mention, with regard to Menedemus. You will let me know every- thing.

LETTER XX.

I HAVE returned my thanks to Vectenus,—for nothing could be more kind. Let Dolabella's des- patches be what you please; only let me have something, or at least a message to Nicias<sup>9</sup>: for who, as you say, did not before understand this arrangement<sup>10</sup>? Do you suppose that any sensible man now entertains a doubt but that it is a journey of despair, not of business? You say that men, and good ones too, already speak of the republic being in extremity. For my part, the very day on which I heard that tyrant<sup>11</sup> called in the assembly "a most eminent man," I began to distrust. But when I was with you at Lanuvium, and saw that our friends had only so much hope of life as Anto- nius had been pleased to afford them, I quite despaired. Therefore, my Atticus, I would have you receive this<sup>12</sup> with the same firmness with which I write it: that species of destruction, by which you are likely to fall<sup>13</sup>, you will esteem dis- graceful, and almost denounced against us by Antonius. From this snare I have determined to withdraw, not for the purpose of flight, but in the hope of a better death. The fault rests wholly with Brutus. You say that Pompeius<sup>14</sup> has been received at Carthæia. Now therefore they must send an army against him. To which camp then should I betake myself? for Antonius cuts off any middle course. That camp is weak; this is wicked. It is time therefore to hasten away. But help me with your advice, whether I should go from Brundisium, or from Puteoli. Brutus adopts a hasty but prudent counsel<sup>15</sup>. I am much con- cerned: for when shall I see him again? But we must bear the afflictions incident to humanity. You are yourself unable to see him. The gods confound this man who is dead<sup>16</sup>, for having ever molested Buthrotum! But, leaving what is past, let us consider what is yet to be done. Though I have not yet seen Eros, yet from his letter, and from what Tiro has ascertained, I am pretty well master of his accounts. You say that I ought to borrow two hundred sestertia (1600*l.*) for five months,—that is, to the first of November. The payment of the money due from Quintus will fall upon that day. I should be glad therefore (as Tiro assures me you would not wish me to go up to Rome expressly for this purpose) that, if you do not object to such a business, you would find out from whence the money can be procured, and contract for it on my behalf. This is what is wanting for the present. I must inquire more particularly about the balance from himself<sup>a</sup>; and in this, about the rents of the dowry<sup>b</sup> estate, which, if they are regularly paid to Cicero, though I wish him to have a liberal allowance, yet will be nearly sufficient for him. I am aware that I must also have money for my journey; but the former may be paid out of the estates as it becomes due; what I want for myself must be had at once. And though I apprehend that he who is afraid of mere shadows<sup>c</sup> is driving on to slaughter, yet I shall not set off till my accounts are cleared. But whether they are unravelled or not, I will examine with you. I have thought it proper to write this with my own hand; and have accordingly done so. About Fadius, as you mention: but to nobody else<sup>d</sup>. I shall hope to have an answer from you to-day.

<sup>13</sup> The text has been supposed to be corrupt. It may perhaps relate to Cicero's apprehension of Antonius's power and cruelty, which Atticus may have declared his determination to abide. Had we Atticus's letters, the sense would probably be clear.

LETTER XXI.

I HAVE to acquaint you that Quintus, the father, is exulting with delight; for his son has written to say that he had wished to go over to Brutus for this reason; that Antonius having pressed him to get him made dictator, and to occupy some fortress, he had refused to do it; and he refused from fear of vexing his father, from which time Antonius had been his enemy. "But afterwards," says he, "I recollected myself<sup>e</sup>, being apprehensive that in his anger towards me, he might do you<sup>f</sup> some injury; therefore I have pacified him; and indeed have received from him a promise of four hundred sestertia (3200*l.*) certain, with the hope of the rest<sup>g</sup>." Statius writes word that he is desirous of living with his father; and, what is surprising, he<sup>h</sup> is also glad of it. Did you ever know a more confirmed profligate than he is<sup>i</sup>? I quite approve of your hesitation in the affair of Canus<sup>j</sup>. I had suspected nothing about the debts; but supposed the dowry<sup>j</sup> to have been entirely repaid. What you defer, that you may speak with me personally, I shall be anxious to hear. You may keep the messenger as long as you please; for I know you are busy. About Xeno you have managed admirably. I will send you what I am writing, as soon as it is finished. You mentioned to Quintus that you had written to him; but nobody brought the letter. Tiro says that you do not now approve of Brundisium<sup>k</sup>, and that you talked something about soldiers. But I had already fixed upon Hydruntum<sup>l</sup>. I was influenced by your five hours' passage. But what a long voyage is this<sup>m</sup>! However, we will see about it. I received no letter from you on the 21st; for now what news is there? You will come then as soon as you are able. I hasten my departure, that Sextus<sup>n</sup> may not first arrive, whom they report to be on his way.

LETTER XXII.

I REJOICE with you upon the departure<sup>o</sup> of young Quintus. He will give us no further trouble<sup>p</sup>. I am ready to believe that Pansa talks favourably; for I know that he has always united himself with Hirtius. I suppose he may be very friendly towards Brutus and Cassius, if he can find his advantage in it; but when will he go near them? Likewise an enemy to Antonius; but when? or why? How long are we to be trifled with<sup>q</sup>? I mentioned that Sextus was on his way, not as if he were just at hand; but because he certainly acts with that view, and will on no account lay down his arms. If he persists, war must be the consequence. But here our Cytherius<sup>r</sup> declares that nobody but the conqueror shall live. What will Pansa say to this? And if war takes place, as it seems probable, which will he join? But of these and other matters when we meet; to-day, as you intimate, or to-morrow.

LETTER XXIII.

I AM wonderfully distracted, yet without any particular uneasiness; but a great number of things occur to me both ways on the subject of my journey. "How long is this to last?" you will say. As long as there is room for hesitation, which will be till I am fairly embarked. If I hear from Pansa, I will send you both my letter and his. I am expecting Silius, to whom I will give<sup>s</sup> the memoir I have drawn up<sup>t</sup>. If there is any news, you will acquaint me with it. I have sent a letter to Brutus. If you know anything about his progress, I shall be obliged to you to inform me.

LETTER XXIV.

THE messenger which I sent to Brutus returned on his journey the 26th. Servilia informed that Brutus had set out that day at ten o'clock. I was sorry my letter had not been received. Silius did not come to me. I drew up a statement, and have sent the account to you. I want to know on what day I may expect you.

LETTER XXV.

THERE is great variety of opinions about my going abroad, for I have many visitors. But let me beg you to take this matter into consideration as a thing of some importance. Do you approve of my returning by the 1st of January? My mind is evenly balanced, yet so that I incline, provided my conduct gives no offence. And have also ably pointed out the day, that was early held sacred; that is, the mysteries<sup>a</sup>. However this may be, accident must regulate the determination about the journey. Let me therefore continue to doubt. For a winter voyage is an odious thing; which was the reason of my going you about the day of the mysteries. I, as you say, that I shall see Brutus. I mean from hence the last day of the month.

LETTER XXVI.

SEE that you have done everything about my business; yet he is uneasy and doubtful whether he should humour Lepta, or shake Silius's. I have heard say that L. Piso wishes to get on some appointment under a forged decree of senate. I should like to know if there is truth in it. The messenger, whom I told you I sent to Brutus at Anagninum, returned on the night previous to the first of the month, bringing a letter, in which there was one thing inconsistent: with his consummate good sense; that is, he wanted me to attend his games<sup>b</sup>. I felt, that in the first place I was already set out, that it was no longer in my power; in the next that it would be very strange for me, who had never gone to Rome at all since this assumption of arms<sup>c</sup>, and that, not so much in consideration of my danger, as of my dignity, suddenly to go up to the games. For at such a time to exhibit games is quite right for him,—it is part of duty; but as it is no part of my duty to see so neither is it becoming. I am indeed exceedingly desirous that they should be exhibited, could be well received, which I trust will be so; and I entreat you to let me know from the beginning how they go off, and afterwards supply the detail through each succeeding day, though about the games. The rest of his letter ter sometimes inclines one way, sometimes another; yet emits occasional sparks of vigour. That you may judge for yourself what to think of it, I send you a copy of the letter, though my messenger informed me that he had also brought a letter from Brutus for you, which had been forwarded to you from Tusculanum. I have so arranged my journey as to be at Puteoli the 7th of July; for I wish to embark as soon as I can, yet so as to use all human precaution in my voyage. You may relieve M. Ælius from all further care. He wants permission to make some excavations at the extremity of his property, which are to pass under ground, and to be subject to certain service<sup>a</sup>. Let him know that I have long since objected to it, and that nothing would be an equivalent to me. But, as you say to me, let it be expressed with all gentleness; and so as rather to relieve him from all further care, than to let him suppose that I am at all offended. I beg you likewise to speak freely with Cascellius upon that subject of Tullius<sup>b</sup>. It is a small concern<sup>c</sup>; but you have very properly adverted to it. It was conducted with too much craftiness. If he had any way imposed upon me, which he was near doing, unless you had ill-naturedly stepped in, I should have been very angry. However it may be therefore, I wish the business to be stopped. Remember <sup>a b c</sup> You will take care to give possession to the person for whom Cicerellia applies, at the highest price which was offered at the sale. I think this was three hundred and eighty sestertia (3000*l.*). If there is any news, or if you foresee anything that is likely to happen, I should wish you to write to me as often as possible. Remember to make my excuse to Varro, as I desired you, for my backwardness in writing. I hope Mundus will trim his opponent<sup>d</sup>. Let me know (for you are curious about such things) what M. Ennius has done respecting the will. From Arpinas, July 2d.

LETTER XXVII.

I AM pleased that you should persuade me to do what I had already done of my own accord the day before. For by the same messenger who took my letter to you on the 2nd, I wrote also to Sestius in terms of great regard. He does kindly to follow me to Puteoli, but his complaint is unreasonable. For it was not so much my business to wait for <sup>a</sup> I have given what appeared to me the most natural interpretation of this passage, which is very obscure and probably much corrupted.

<sup>b</sup> By comparison with letter 29 of this book, there is reason to suppose that this relates to some interest of money due to Cicero.

<sup>c</sup> After the sentence relating to Tullius; which seems to be inserted without any other connexion with the preceding, than what may have arisen from its place in Atticus's letter; he seems here to revert to the subject of M. Ælius's request, which Atticus may have been the first to mention.

<sup>d</sup> This I understand to be said in jest; the notice which Atticus had taken of the business having thwarted Ælius's designs.

him on his return from Cosanum, as his, either not to go till he had seen me, or to come back sooner. For he knew I was anxious to set off, and had written to say that he would come to me at Tusculanum. I am troubled at the tears you shed upon leaving me<sup>d</sup>. If you had done so in my presence, I might possibly have changed altogether my resolution of going. But I like the hope, with which you consoled yourself, of our soon meeting again, which expectation is indeed my greatest support. You shall have no want of letters. I will inform you of everything relating to Brutus. I shall very soon send you my treatise upon Glory, and I will make out something in the manner of Heracles, which may lie by in your closet. I remember about Plancus. Attica has reason to complain<sup>e</sup>. Your information about Bacchis, and about the chaplets on the statues, was highly acceptable; and I trust you will hereafter omit nothing, not only of so great, but of ever so little interest. I shall not forget Herodes and Mettius, and everything, which I can but suspect will be agreeable to you. O disgraceful son of your sister! He arrived as I was writing this, about sunset, while we were at dinner.

LETTER XXVIII.

As I wrote you word yesterday, I have settled to get to Puteolanum<sup>f</sup> on the 7th. There I shall hope to hear daily from you, especially upon the subject of the games<sup>g</sup>; of which you must also send an account to Brutus. I sent you yesterday a copy of a letter I had from him, which I was hardly able to understand<sup>h</sup>. Make my excuses to my Attica, so that all the blame may rest upon you; and assure her that I have by no means "brought away with me all my affection."<sup>i</sup>

LETTER XXIX.

I SEND you Brutus's letter<sup>j</sup>. Good gods! What a want of resource! You will see when you

<sup>f</sup> I have taken the liberty of inserting this word in the place of "Tusculanum," which is found in all the editions. The alteration is very slight, and amply warranted by tracing Cicero's progress from the evidence of his other letters. For he appears to have gone from Puteoli on the 30th of June [letter 25 of this book] to Arpinum July 2 [letter 26], and thence to Tusculanum July 3 [letter 28], where he took leave of Atticus [letter 27], and from whence we find him at Formiæ July 6 [letter 29] on his way back to Puteoli July 7 [book xvi. letter 1], where he was to embark.

<sup>h</sup> It is said letter 26 of this book that Brutus' sentiments incline "sometimes one way, sometimes another;" so that here we are to understand Cicero as hardly knowing what conclusion to draw respecting the measures he would pursue. The same meaning is attached to the word interpretari in letter 19 of this book.

read it. Respecting the celebration of Brutus's games I agree with you. You need not go to M. Ælius's house; but speak to him<sup>k</sup> when you meet him. About the six per cent. from Tullius you may employ M. Axianus, as you mention. Your transaction with Cosianus is well managed; and it gives me pleasure to find that you attend to your own concerns as well as mine. I am glad my lieutenant<sup>l</sup> is approved. May the gods accomplish what you promise<sup>m</sup>! For what is there that I prefer to my friends? Though I have my fears about her<sup>n</sup>, whom you except. When I have seen Brutus, I will write you a full account. I wish it may be true about Plancus and Decimus<sup>o</sup>. I do not like Sextus's throwing away his shield. Tell me if you know anything about Munda. I have replied to all your observations; now hear mine. Quintus the son is come to conduct me to Puteoli. A famous citizen! you might call him Favonius, or Asinius. He did it for two reasons; to attend me, and to make his peace with Brutus and Cassius. But what say you? For I know you are well acquainted with the Othos. He says that he is going to take to himself Julia<sup>p</sup>: for a divorce is settled. His father asked me what was said of her. I replied, that I had heard nothing (for I did not know why he asked), excepting what related to her features, and to her parentage. But why? said I. Upon which he told me that his son wished to marry her. Then I, notwithstanding my abhorrence, yet said that I did not suppose the reports to be true. It is his object (for this is it) to give our nephew nothing. She will have him without regarding his father. I suspect however that the young man dreams as usual. But I should be glad if you would make inquiry, which you can easily do, and let me know.

I beseech you, what is this? After I had sealed my letter, some persons from Formiæ, who were dining with me, told me they had seen Plancus, him who is engaged about Buthrotum<sup>q</sup>, the day previous to my writing this, that is, on the 5th, dejected and without his trappings; and that the servants said, that he and his colonists<sup>r</sup> had been turned out by the Buthrotians. Well done! But I beg you to write me an account of the whole business.

<sup>o</sup> Plancus and Decimus Brutus had been nominated by Caesar consuls elect for the year after Hirtius and Pansa. They now commanded one the further, the other the nearer Gaul. It is probable that at this time Plancus had declared his determination to join Decimus Brutus against Antonius.

<sup>p</sup> It was proverbially disgraceful for one "to throw away his shield;" which means here "giving up the cause." [See book xvi. letter 1.] It is not unlikely that the expression may have been borrowed from Atticus.

<sup>q</sup> It is to be supposed that she was married to one of the Othos.

<sup>r</sup> To make a distribution of lands in Epirus. See Appendix. He is so distinguished, as being a different person from that Plancus, who was before mentioned in this letter.

LETTER I.

ARRIVED at Puteolanum the 7th of July, and is the following day on my way to Brutus.<sup>1</sup> But while I was at dinner the day I, Eros delivered to me your letter. Is it the edict for proclaiming the games, is the instead of Quintilis, called July, according to a new name given to it in honour of Cæsar?<sup>2</sup> gods confound those people! Island not far from Puteoli, where the younger relation of Brutus, had a villa. I want to make this intelligible to the English reader, ought it necessary thus to paraphrase what is contained in two words. I have throughout the English dates; and in general the months have the same denominations in both languages; except July and August used to be called Quintilis and I the first was altered in honour of Julius Cæsar after his death, the other afterwards in honour of the Marian faction, by whom this date is supposed to be inserted in the proclamation.

It has been variously tortured. Without altering of the manuscripts, I understand ἐκείνῃ from Homer II. ii. 236. where Thersites says—ὦ πόδας καὶ κούρη. "Nothing is more common in than such partial quotations. The et preceding word, I take to be part of the Latin text. See book xv. letter 29.

me pleasure. Among the rest this is not amiss, that he was authorised to assure me his allowance was amply sufficient; that 72 sestertia (580*l.*) were sufficient, fully and entirely; but that Xeno doled it out sparingly and reluctantly, that is, by little at a time. What you have transmitted beyond the rents of the houses<sup>4</sup>, may be placed to that year, upon which fell the additional expense of his journey; and in future, dating from the first of April<sup>5</sup>, let his allowance be raised to 80 sestertia (640*l.*); for the houses now produce so much. But it must be considered what should be done when he returns to Rome, for I do not think that mother-in-law<sup>6</sup> can be tolerated. I rejected the proposal through the tall Pindarus<sup>7</sup>. Now hear for what purpose I have sent the messenger. Quintus the son promises me that he will be a very Cato; and both the father and the son have been urgent with me to commend him to you; yet so, that you might only give credit to him when you should be satisfied from your own knowledge. I shall give him a letter agreeable to his own wishes; but, that you may not be moved by it, I write this for the purpose of assuring you that I am not moved myself. The gods grant that he may fulfil what he promises! It would be a general joy. But I say no more. He sets out from hence the 9th. For he says there is an assignment for the 15th, and that he is severely pressed. You will regulate by my letter the manner in which you are to answer him. I will write more when I have seen Brutus, and send back Eros. I admit the excuse of my Attica, and love her dearly. My compliments to her and to Pilia.

LETTER II<sup>b</sup>.

(Græc. v.)

BRUTUS is already expecting to hear from you. What I told him of Attius's "Tereus"<sup>1</sup> was not new; but he supposed it to have been the "Brutus". However, some rumour had reached him that the exhibition of the Grecian games<sup>2</sup> had not been well

<sup>b</sup> This is probably the letter which was taken by young Quintus, and which I have thought fit to place the second in this book, having apparently been written on the evening of July 8, after his visit to Brutus in company with young Quintus. The behaviour of both parties at that visit, may have given Cicero additional confidence in his nephew's professions; which afterwards proved to be sincere.

attended; which did not surprise me; for you know my opinion of them<sup>1</sup>. Now hear what is better than all. Quintus has passed several days with me; and if I wished it, would even have staid longer: but, while he was here, you cannot believe how much he delighted me in every respect; particularly in that<sup>2</sup> wherein I was least satisfied. For he is so entirely changed by means of some writings which I had in hand, and by repeated conversation and instruction, that he will in future be disposed towards the republic as we could wish. Having not only assured me, but persuaded me of his sincerity, he has been very earnest with me to vouch to you for his conducting himself in a manner honourable both to you and to me. And he does not ask you immediately to trust him; but when you are thoroughly satisfied, then to give him your affection. Unless he had convinced me, and I had believed what I tell you to be certain, I should not have done what I am going to mention. For I took the young man with me to Brutus, who was so well satisfied with what I relate, that he gave full credit to it himself, and refused to accept me as a voucher; but commending him, spake most kindly of you; and upon taking leave of him, embraced and kissed him. Therefore, though I have more reason to congratulate you than to ask you, yet I do ask that if heretofore he appears to have been guilty of some indiscretions owing to the infirmity of youth, you will believe that he has renounced them; and trust me when I add, that your authority will have great, or rather the greatest, effect in confirming his resolution. Having several times thrown out to Brutus my design of sailing in his company, he did not seem to catch at it, as I had expected. I thought him absorbed; which indeed is the case, particularly on the subject of the games. But on my return home, Cn. Luccius, who sees a great deal of Brutus, informed me that he delayed his voyage, not from irresolution, but waiting if any chance should arise. I therefore doubt whether I should go to Venusia, and there wait to hear about the troops. If they are not in the neighbourhood, as some suppose, I may go to Hydruntum. If neither<sup>3</sup> is safe, I shall return to this place. Do you think I am jesting<sup>4</sup>? May I die if anybody keeps me besides you. For only look round—But I blush to say it before your face. How charmingly are the days pointed out in Lepidus's<sup>5</sup> auspices; and how conveniently for the purpose of my return! I derive from your letter a great encouragement to set out. And I wish I may see you there<sup>6</sup>. But as you shall think most advantageous<sup>7</sup>. I am expecting Nepos's<sup>8</sup> letter. Is he desirous to possess my writings, who considers as unfit to be read those subjects<sup>9</sup> of which I am most proud? And you say, "after him, who is irreproachable"; but it is you who are "irreproachable," while he is "divine." There is no collection of my letters; but my Tiro has about seventy, and some may be got from you. These I must look over and correct, and then they shall be published<sup>10</sup>.

LETTER III.

(Grav. ii.)

On the 10th I received two letters, one by my own messenger, the other by Brutus's. We had here a very different report respecting the Buthrarians. But to this among many other things we must submit. I send back Eros sooner than I had intended, that there may be somebody to attend to Hortensius; and also because he says he has made an appointment with the knights<sup>1</sup>. Hortensius however is very unreasonable; for there is nothing owing to him excepting from the third instalment<sup>2</sup>, which becomes due the 1st of August; and of this very instalment the greater part has been paid him some time before the day. But Eros will see about this on the 15th. In the case of Publius<sup>3</sup>, I think there ought to be no delay in making the proper assignment. Yet when you consider how far I have receded from my right, by paying at once 200 out of the 400 sesteria (3200*l.*) and giving a bid for the remainder, you may mention to him, if you please, that he ought to wait my convenience after the loss I have sustained in my just claims. But I entreat you, my dear Atticus, (do you observe how I coax?) as long as you remain in Rome, manage, regulate, govern all my concerns, without waiting to hear from me. For though the balance is quite sufficient to discharge all demands, yet it frequently happens that our own debtors are not punctual to their time. If anything of this sort should occur, let my credit be of the first consideration with you: so as to support it by borrowing, or even by selling, if circumstances render it necessary. Brutus was much pleased with your letter. For I was with him several hours in Nema soon after I had received it. He seemed to be delighted with "Terentius"<sup>4</sup>, and to feel himself under greater obligation to Accius than to Antonius. For myself, the more I am pleased with the account, the more it excites my indignation and vexation, that the Roman people should employ their hands, not in defending the republic, but in applauding it.

<sup>3</sup> It is to be supposed that Atticus had solicited him to publish a collection of his letters.

<sup>5</sup> Should not this be written Hordeonius, who was before stated to have succeeded to part of Cluvius's estate? [See book xiii. letter 46.] Whoever he was, Cicero appears to have purchased his interest on condition of paying for it by three instalments.

<sup>6</sup> Brother to Cicero's second wife, to whom, upon his divorce, he was to repay her fortune. See book xiii. letter 34.

<sup>4</sup> This may perhaps allude to some letter from Atticus adverting to book xv. letter 27, in which Cicero had expressed his concern at parting from him.

<sup>5</sup> Lepidus was chief pontifex at this time; in which capacity he appointed the days for the augurs to take the auspices, and Cicero, it will be recollected, belonged to the college of augurs.

thank him<sup>l</sup>. For as you rightly observe, we can more easily bear the loss of our public rights than of our private ones. When you say that you are more and more pleased with "O Titus," &c.<sup>m</sup>, you give me fresh spirits to write. In your expectation of seeing Eros, and not empty-handed<sup>n</sup>, I am glad that you have not been disappointed. But what I have sent you is the same treatise retouched; and indeed it is the original itself in many places interpolated and amended. When it has been transcribed on large paper, you may read it in private to your guests. But as you love me, show yourself cheerful and entertain them well, lest they vent upon me the displeasure they may feel towards you<sup>o</sup>. I wish that what I hear of Cicero may be true. I shall know about Xeno, when I am there<sup>p</sup>; though I cannot suppose that he would do anything either inattentively or illiberally. Respecting Herodes, I will do as you desire; and what you mention, I will learn from Saufeius and Xeno.
 On the subject of Quintus the son, I am glad the letter<sup>q</sup>, which I sent by my messenger, was delivered to you previously to that which he took himself; though you would not have been deceived. Nevertheless—But I am anxious to know what he said to you and you to him; yet I have no doubt that each behaved in his own manner. I hope to receive the account by Curius; who, amiable as he is himself and beloved by me, yet derives a great additional regard from your recommendation. I have replied to your letter. Now hear what I am persuaded is unnecessary to be written, but yet I write. Many considerations affect me on my departure, and most of all, that I am separated from you. Besides, I dislike the trouble of a voyage, unsuitable not only to my age, but also to my character. And the time of my departure has something absurd in it; for I leave a state of peace, to come back to war; and the interval that might be spent among my small estates, in convenient and sufficiently pleasant houses, I am going to waste in travelling. My consolation is that I shall either be of service to Cicero, or shall be able to judge what advantage is to be expected. Then you, as I hope, and as you promise, will presently be there. If this happens, everything will go better with me. But I am much vexed about the balance of my accounts. For though it is all clear, yet Dolabella's debt being entered among them, and his assignees total strangers to me, I feel anxious about it; so that among all my troubles nothing vexes me more. Therefore I do not think I have done wrong in having written to Balbus more openly, that if anything of the kind should happen, and the payments should not correspond, he might assist me; likewise in having desired you in the event of such an accident to communicate with <sup>l</sup> Antonius may have agreed to acknowledge Atticus's payment in exemption, or partly in exemption, of further demands upon Buthrotum. With this the following sentence very well agrees; meaning, that he did right to thank Antonius for his private services, notwithstanding the public wrongs entailed upon the state. Res publica and res familiaris, are here opposed to each other.

<sup>m</sup> These words are the beginning of Cicero's treatise upon him; which you will do if you see occasion, more especially if you go into Epirus. I write this on the point of embarking from Pompeianum with three small vessels of ten oars each. Brutus is still in Neais, Cassius at Naples. Are you pleased with Deiotarus, and are you not pleased with Hieras<sup>a</sup>? who having been directed at the time that Bleamius came to me to do nothing without consulting our friend Sextus<sup>b</sup>, made no communication to him nor to any of us. I long to kiss my Attica for the sweet salutation she sent me through you. You will return therefore my kindest compliments to her, and present them likewise to Pilia.

LETTER V.

(Græc. iv.)

As I told you in the letter you would receive yesterday or perhaps to-day (for Quintus<sup>c</sup> said the next day), I went to Neais the 8th. Brutus was there. How he was vexed about the 7th of July! He was wonderfully disturbed, and said that he should write to desire that the fights with the wild beasts, which were to take place the day after the Apollinary games, might be proclaimed for the 13th of Quintilis. Libo came in and said that Philo, Pompeius's freed-man, and his own freed-man Hilarus, had arrived from Sextus<sup>d</sup> with a letter to the consuls, or whatever else they are to be called<sup>e</sup>. He read us a copy of it. I said what I thought, that some few things were irrelevant; but otherwise it was sufficiently dignified and not disrespectful. I only wanted to have added that what was inscribed to the consuls alone, should have been to the pretors, tribunes of the people and senate, lest they should not produce what had been sent to themselves. They say that Sextus was at Carthagena with only one legion; and that he received the account of Cæsar the very day on which he had taken the town of Borea; that after taking the town there was a wonderful expression of joy, a change in men's minds, and a concourse from all parts; but that he returned to the six legions which he had left in the further part of Spain. To Libo himself however he wrote word that there could be no accommodation unless he were permitted to resume his own<sup>f</sup> house. The sum of his demands was, that all the armies should be dismissed wherever they might be. So much for Sextus. Respecting the Buthrotians, after every inquiry I hear nothing certain. Some report that the settlers were cut to pieces; some, that Plancus, upon receiving a sum of money, had run away and <sup>a</sup> Deiotarus having been deprived of his kingdom of Armenia by Cæsar, sent Hieras and Bleamius his agents to Rome to procure its restitution, upon which occasion Cicero was his advocate with Cæsar. But upon Cæsar's death Hieras seems to have been the person who secretly gained over Fulvia, Antonius's wife, and purchased what he wanted for a large sum of money. [See book xiv. letter 12.] Deiotarus had already seized his dominions by force, which Antonius may have approved.

left them. So that I do not see how I can ascertain what the truth of it is, unless you presently write to me. The going to Brundisium, about which I doubted, seems to be at an end; for the legions<sup>h</sup> are said to be approaching. But this voyage<sup>i</sup> has some suspicion of danger. Therefore I determined to sail in company with Brutus. I found him better prepared than I had understood. For Domitius<sup>j</sup> has himself some good vessels; and there are besides some distinguished ones belonging to Sestius, Bucilianus, and others. For upon Cassius's fleet, which is quite a fine one, I cannot reckon beyond the straits<sup>k</sup>. It is rather unpleasant to me that Brutus seems to be so little inclined to hasten his voyage. He waits first to hear the issue of the games; and afterwards, as far as I can learn, means to proceed slowly and stop at several places. Yet I think it is better to sail slowly than not to sail at all; and if, when we have made some way, the passage appears clear<sup>l</sup>, I shall take advantage of the Etesian winds<sup>m</sup>.

LETTER VI.

HITHERTO (for I am got as far as Sica's at Vibo<sup>n</sup>) I have sailed rather conveniently than expeditiously; for a great part of the way has been performed by rowing; there being none of the winds which usually precede the Etesian. It happened also very opportunely that we passed over the two bays of Pæstum and Vibo, which must be passed with an even course<sup>o</sup>. I got to Sica's the eighth day after I left Pompeianum, having stayed one day at Velia, where I was much at my ease at my friend Thalna's. I could not have been received more hospitably, especially in his absence. I arrived at Sica's on the 24th, where I was quite at home; therefore I stayed over the next day. But I mean when I get to Rhegium, before I undertake my longer passage, to consider whether I shall go in a heavy vessel to Patras, or in a light one to the Tarentine Leucopetra<sup>p</sup>, and from thence to Cocyra; and if I go in a ship of burden, whether I shall at once cross over from the straits or go by way of Syracuse. Upon this subject I will write to you from Rhegium. In truth, my Atticus, I often ask myself what is the purpose of this voyage? Why am I not with you? Why am I not visiting my own villas, those dear spots of Italy? But it is he 6th of August, having set out from Leu-, from whence I meant to pass over to when I had proceeded about forty miles I ven back by a violent south wind to the ort of Leucopetra. There while I was for a fair wind, at the house of my friend , so that I was altogether at my ease and ofortable, there arrived some Rhegians of on, who had recently come from Rome,—ong them one who had been staying with tus at Naples. They brought with them lamation of Brutus and Cassius, and said s to be a full senate on the 1st of Septem- that Brutus and Cassius had written to the tter 3 of this book.

consular and prætorian members to request their attendance. They reported that great hope was entertained of Antonius's giving way, of some accommodation, and of our friends' returning to Rome. They added also that my absence was regretted, and in some degree blamed. Upon hearing this, I did not hesitate to lay aside all thoughts of my voyage, which, to say the truth, I never much liked: but when I read your letter I confess I was surprised that you should so vehemently have changed your opinion,—though I concluded it was not without good reason. Yet if you were not the adviser and promoter of my going, at least you were an approver of it provided I returned to Rome by the 1st of January. Thus I should have been away, while the danger was likely to be less, and should have come into the very flame. But if this was not so prudent, I have however no cause to be displeased; for in the first place it was done by my own judgment; and in the next place, even if it had been by your advice, what is expected of one who gives advice, besides integrity? I cannot sufficiently wonder at the following expressions in your letter:—"Come then, you who prefer an honourable death<sup>1</sup>, come; will you desert your country?" Did I desert it? Or did I then appear to you to desert it? You not only did not prevent it, but you even approved of it. The rest was still more severe; "I wish you would draw up for me some note to prove that you have done right." So then, my Atticus, does my conduct stand in need of defence, especially before you who so strongly approved it? Yes, I will compose an apology; but it shall be to some one of those who disliked and dissuaded my going. Though what need now of "a note?" If I had persevered there might have been need: but this very want of consistency may be objected to me. No philosopher, among the many things that have been written on questions of this kind, ever called a change of opinion by the name of inconsistency. Afterwards you go on thus: "for if this had been done by my friend Phædrus<sup>2</sup>, there would be a ready excuse; but what are we to say now?" So then, what I have done is of such a nature that I cannot approve it to Cato<sup>3</sup>, being full of guilt and infamy. I wish it had appeared so to you from the beginning; you should have been my Cato, as you always are. This last is the most galling of all, "for our Brutus says nothing;" that is, he does not venture to admonish a person of my age. I can put no other interpretation on these words; and assuredly so it is: for on the 16th of August, when I had arrived at Velia, Brutus heard of it, being with his ship off the river Heles, three miles east of Velia. He immediately came on foot to me. Immortal gods! What satisfaction did he show at my return, or rather my coming back! He then poured forth everything that he had suppressed,—so as to make me recollect that expression of yours, "for our Brutus says nothing." He particularly regretted my absence from the senate on the 1st of August. Piso he extolled to the skies. He said that he was glad that I had avoided two heavy imputations; one of despondency and desertion of the republic, which I was aware that I incurred by going away,—for many with tears uttered their complaints before me, and would not be persuaded of my speedy return; the other, upon which Brutus and those who were with him (and they were a good many) expressed their joy, that I had avoided the imputation of being supposed to go to the Olympic Games. Nothing could have been more disreputable than this at any period of the republic,—and at this period quite inexcusable. But I cordially thank the south wind, which has saved me from this disgrace. You have here plausible reasons for my coming back, and reasons which are at the same time just and ample: yet there can be no juster reason than what you mention yourself in another letter,—“if there is anything owing to anybody take care to provide some source from whence an equivalent may be drawn; for the apprehension of war has produced a wonderful difficulty in raising money.” This letter I read in the middle of the straits; and no means of providing this occurred to me but by coming up to my own support. But enough of this; the rest when we meet. Brutus has shown me Antonius’s proclamation, and their reply, which is admirably drawn up. But I really do not see what effect these proclamations can have, or what is their object; nor am I now, as Brutus imagined, going thither to take any part in public affairs. For what can be done! Has anybody seconded Piso? Did he himself return again the next day? But they say that at my age one ought not to be at a great distance from his grave<sup>a</sup>. But pray what is this which I hear from Brutus? He said you had written word that Pilia had suffered an attack of palsy. I am exceedingly concerned,—though at the same time he added that you hoped she was better. I earnestly wish it. Present my best compliments to her, and to sweetest Attica. I write this on board, approaching to Pompeianum, on the 19th.

LETTER VIII.

WHEN I know what day I shall arrive<sup>a</sup>, I will let you know. I must wait for my heavy goods, which are coming from Anagnia; besides which, several of my family are sick. On the evening of the first<sup>b</sup> I received a letter from Octavianus. He is attempting great things; he has gained over to his party all the veterans who are at Casilinum and Calatia<sup>c</sup>,—and no wonder; for he gives a bounty

<sup>b</sup> At Rome. In the interval between the time of writing the preceding letter and this, Cicero had gone up to Rome, where he arrived August 31, and was received with great compliments and congratulations. The following day, Sept. 1, he was solicited by Antonius to attend the senate; but excused himself on the pretence of fatigue; but really because he knew it was fruitless to resist the proposal of Antonius to decree divine honours to Cæsar. Antonius in rage threatened to pull down his house. Thereupon, on Sept. 2, Cicero pronounced his first Philippic against Antonius; and before the end of the month he retired to the neighbourhood of Naples, where he composed his second Philippic, distinguished for the free exposure of Antonius’s character. He still continued in the same neighbourhood when he wrote the present letter in the month of November.

of 500 denarii (16*l.*). He thinks of going through the other colonies. He plainly aims at making himself the head of an army to be brought against Antonius. Accordingly, I see that in a few days we shall be in arms. Whom then should I follow? Consider his name<sup>d</sup>, consider his age; and he requests to have first some conversation with me secretly either at Capua or not far from Capua. But it is childish to suppose that this can be done secretly. I informed him by letter that this was neither necessary nor possible to be done. He sent to me one Casina of Volaterra, a friend of his, who brought word that Antonius was advancing towards Rome with the legion of Alaudans<sup>e</sup>,—that he demanded contributions from all the free towns,—and was conducting a legion<sup>f</sup> with military ensigns. He consulted me whether he should march to Rome with 3000 veterans, or should maintain the post of Capua, and prevent Antonius’s approach,—or should go to meet the three Macedonian legions which are advancing along the upper coast, and which he hopes are in his interest. They refused to receive Antonius’s bounty, as this person relates,—and bitterly insulted him, and left him whilst he was haranguing them. In short, he<sup>g</sup> assumes the command, and thinks that I ought to support him. I, for my part, advised him to go to Rome; for I thought he would have with him both the city populace, and, if he could gain their confidence, likewise the most respectable citizens. O Brutus, where are you? What a fine opportunity<sup>h</sup> do you lose! I did not foresee exactly this: but I fully expected something of the kind. Now I want your counsel. Shall I go to Rome? or shall I remain where I am<sup>i</sup>? or shall I retire to Arpinum? For that place possesses great security. To Rome I think; in case I should be wanted if anything decisive occurs. Resolve me this, therefore: I never was in greater perplexity.

LETTER IX.

I RECEIVED two letters in one day from Octavianus. He now wants me to go immediately to Rome, and says that he is desirous of acting by the authority of the senate; to which I replied, that the senate could not meet before the first of January, which I believe to be the case<sup>j</sup>. But then he adds, “by your advice.” In short, he presses hard, and I try to excuse myself. I cannot trust his youth; I do not know his real intentions; I do not care to do anything without your friend Pansa<sup>k</sup>. I am afraid of Antonius’s power, and may circulate so freely as to find its way even into Sica's house. But we have need of that time, when those<sup>1</sup> triumphs lived. May I die if it is not wittily said. I would have you read it to Sextus, and tell me what he thinks of it. He alone is as good as ten thousand to me. But take care that Calenus and Calvena<sup>2</sup> do not come in. When you say you are afraid of tiring me, you tire me? Nobody less. For as Aristophanes said of Archilochus's Iambics<sup>1</sup>, so may I of your letters, that I like the longest the best. But you are advising me. Even if you were finding fault with me, I should not only bear it patiently, but should be pleased, as long as good sense and kindness are mingled with reproof. Accordingly I shall readily adopt your corrections, and put "the same right as Rubrius's," instead of "as Scipio's;" and in the matter of Dolabella's praises I will lessen their heap. Yet I think there is in that place a fine irony, when I represent him to have been in three engagements against Roman citizens. I like better too that expression, "it is most unfit that this man should live," than, "what is more unfit?" I am glad you like Varro's Peplographia. I have not yet got from him that Heracleidean work. In exhorting me to write, you show your friendship; but let me assure you that I do nothing else. I am sorry for your cold, and beg you to apply to it your usual attention. I rejoice to think that "O Titus<sup>m</sup>" has been of use to you. The Anagnians<sup>n</sup> are, Mustella the captain of the gladiators, and Laco, who is a great drinker. I will polish up, and send you the book you desire. What follows is in reply to the latter of the two letters. The treatise on Duties, as far as Panætius has gone, I have comprised in two books. There are three of his. But having in the beginning divided the consideration of duties into three kinds; one, when we deliberate whether anything is honourable or base; the second, whether it is useful or prejudicial; the third, how we are to judge when these clash together (as in the case of Regulus<sup>o</sup>, it was honourable to return, and useful to remain); he has treated admirably of the two first; respecting the third he promises hereafter, but has written nothing. The subject has been prosecuted by Posidonius, whose book I have sent for; and have written to Athenodorus Calvus to give me the heads of it, which I am expecting. I wish you would urge him, and request him to do it as quickly as he can. In this <sup>1</sup> This is apparently copied from some letter of Atticus. But what three people or what time is meant is uncertain. A. Gellius mentions that Nevius, a writer of plays, had animadverted so freely upon some leading persons, as to have been cast into prison by certain triumvirs; but I know not if this can be the circumstance intended.—Aul. is treated of duties under particular circumstances. With regard to the title, I have no doubt of καθήκον being duty, unless you have anything to say to the contrary. But "of duties," is a fuller title. And I address my son Cicero, which seemed not unsuitable. Nothing can be more clear than your account of Myrtilus<sup>p</sup>. How poignant are your observations on these people<sup>q</sup>! Is it thus against D. Brutus? The gods confound them! I have not busied myself in Pompeianum, as I proposed; first, on account of the weather; then which nothing can be worse; then, I have every day a letter from Octavianus, begging me to undertake the conduct of affairs, to come to Capua a second time to save the republic, at all events to go immediately to Rome. "They were ashamed to refuse, and afraid to venture!" He has however acted and still acts strenuously: and will bring a strong force with him to Rome; but he is a mere boy. He thinks the senate may be assembled immediately. But who will attend? Or, if he does, who in this uncertain state of affairs will choose to offend Antonius? On the 1st of January he may perhaps afford protection; or things may come to a crisis before. The free towns are wonderfully inclined towards the boy. For on his way to Samnium he came to Cales, and slept at Theanus's. The greeting and exhortation was surprising. Would you have thought it? On this account I shall go to Rome sooner than I had intended. As soon as I have fixed the time, I will write. Though I have not read the conditions (for Eros has not arrived), yet I shall be glad if you will conclude the business<sup>r</sup> on the twelfth. I shall be better able to write to Catina<sup>s</sup>, Tauromenium and Syracuse, if Valerius the interpreter sends me the names of those in power; for they change at different times, and my own acquaintance are mostly dead. I have written a public letter, if Valerius will make use of it; else he must send me the names. Balbus has written to me about the holidays set forth by Lepidus<sup>t</sup>. I shall wait till the 29th, and hope to hear from you. And by that time I expect to know the event of Torquatus's business<sup>u</sup>. I send you a letter from Quintus<sup>v</sup>, that you may see how much he loves him<sup>w</sup>, whom he is sorry you should love so little. Give Attica a kiss for me on account of her cheerfulness, which is the best sign in children. Farewell.

no answer, I have adopted a counsel of my own, and think of going to Rome on the 12th. I considered that it was better for me to be there to no purpose, at a time when it was not necessary, than, if I should be wanted, to be absent. Besides, I have some fear of being intercepted; for he<sup>z</sup> may arrive presently; though there are various reports, and some that I should like to have verified. But there is nothing certain. Yet whatever happens, I would rather be with you than remain at a distance, in anxiety both about you and about myself. But what can I say to you? Be of good courage<sup>a</sup>. This is a lively sally<sup>b</sup> on the subject of Varro's Heraclideum. Nothing ever amused me so much. But of this and other greater matters when we meet.

LETTER XIII.

WHAT a strange chance! On the 8th having left Sinuessanum before it was light, and got by the dawn of day as far as the Tirense bridge at Minturne, where the road turns to Arpinas, I met the messenger just as I was "entering upon my long course." I immediately cried out, "If you have anything from Atticus, give it me." But I was not yet able to read; for I had sent away the torches, and the light was insufficient. But as soon as I could see, I first began to read the former of your two letters. It is elegant beyond everything. As I hope to be saved, I say nothing different from what I feel. I never read anything more kind. I will come then whither you call me, provided you assist me. But at first I thought nothing could be so irrelative to that letter, in which I had asked for your advice, as this answer; till I found another, in which you direct me, in the words of Homer, "to pass by the stormy Minæ<sup>c</sup> to the island of Psyria<sup>d</sup>, keeping the Appian<sup>e</sup> road on the left." That day then I slept at Aquinum, rather a long journey, and a bad road: I deliver this as I am setting out from thence the next morning<sup>f</sup>.

LETTER XIV.

(Part of Letter xiii. in Grævius's Edition.)

Eros's letter has obliged me to send up much against my will. Tiro will explain the business to you. You will consider what is to be done. I wish you besides to write frequently, and to inform me whether I may advance nearer; for I should like better to be at Tusculanum, or somewhere in the suburb; or whether you think I must go yet further off. There will every day be somebody to a letter. It is difficult, at this distance, to answer your inquiry, what I think you ought to do. However, if they<sup>a</sup> are upon an equality with each other, it will be best to remain quiet. But if<sup>b</sup>,—the chief will spread, first to us<sup>c</sup>, then generally, I expect your advice. I am afraid of being at when I ought to be there, and yet I dare go up. Of Antonius's movements I now hear something different from what I mentioned. I thought you therefore to explain everything, and let me know the truth. For the rest, what can I say to you? I am inflamed with the love of history<sup>d</sup>. Your encouragement stimulates me beyond measure. But it can neither be entered upon nor effected without your assistance. We will therefore consider of it together when we meet. At present I thought you would send me word, under what censorius, the son of Marcus, was tribune of the commons. For I seem to have heard that it was P. Africanus and L. Mummius, and want to know now if it is so. Send me a true and clear account of every change that happens. From Athens, the 11th<sup>e</sup>.

LETTER XV.

(Grav. xiv.)

AVR positively nothing to tell you. While I remained at Puteoli there was every day something new about Octavianus, and many false reports about Antonius. But in answer to what you mention, I received three letters from you on the 11th, exactly agree with you. If Octavianus acquires power, the acts of the tyrant will be established more firmly than in the temple of Tellus<sup>e</sup>, which will be unfavourable for Brutus. But if he remains, you see how insupportable Antonius will be to that it is difficult to choose between them. I am sad fellow, Sestius's messenger! He proposes to be at Rome the day after he left Puteoli. I admonish me to proceed gently, I assent, but I think differently from you. Neither Brutus nor Marcellus<sup>f</sup> have any weight with you or theirs is a different case; or if it is not, it appears to be so<sup>g</sup>. But this young man, who does not want spirit, wants authority. However, if I can prudently be at Tusculanum, or whether that or this<sup>h</sup> would be better when Antonius arrives. I shall be there with more pleasure, because I shall know all that takes place.

But, to pass from one subject to another, no doubt that what the Greeks call καθήκον, I call "duty." Why should you doubt about duty rightly applied to the state? Do we not say "the duty of the consuls?" "the duty of the judges?" It suits admirably; or give me a better word. This is sad intelligence about Nepos's son. In truth I am much concerned, and sorry for it. I did not know that there had been such a boy. I have lost Caninius, a man, as far as regards me, always very kind. There is no occasion for your speaking to Athenodorus<sup>i</sup>, for he has sent me a very handsome abstract. Pray take every precaution about your cold. Quintus, the great-grandson of your grandfather, has written to my father's grandson<sup>j</sup>, that after the 5th of that month on which I distinguished myself<sup>k</sup>, he will lay open the state of the temple of Ops<sup>l</sup>, and that before the people. You will see, therefore, and write me word. I am anxious to know Sextus's opinion<sup>m</sup>.

LETTER XVI.

(Grav. xv.)

Do not suppose it is from indolence that I decline writing with my own hand; yet in truth it is from indolence, for I have nothing else to allege. However, in your letters likewise I think I can trace Alexis<sup>n</sup>. But to come to my purpose: if Dolabella had not used me shamefully, I might perhaps have doubted whether I ought to relax or to contend for my utmost right. But now I am even glad that an opportunity is offered to me, by which he and everybody else may know that I have withdrawn my affection from him; and I may publicly declare, that, both on my own account, and that of the republic, I hold him in aversion. For after having at my instance undertaken the defence of the republic, he has not only been bribed with money to desert it, but, as far as was in his power, he has contributed to ruin it. In answer to your question, how I mean to proceed when the day<sup>o</sup> arrives: in the first place I should like it to be so, that there may be no impropriety in my being at Rome; about which, as about everything else, I will do as you think right. But upon the whole, I am disposed to act vigorously and sternly. And though it may seem to be in some measure discreditable to call upon the sureties, yet I would have you take this under your consideration; for I may introduce agents for this purpose; and the sureties will not resist the claim. Upon this I am confident the sureties will be released. But I think it will be disgraceful in him<sup>p</sup>, especially as he has pledged himself in the debt, not to redeem his agents; and it becomes my own character to prosecute my right without exposing him to extreme ignominy. I should be glad if you would inform me what is your opinion about this; and doubt not but you will be able to settle the whole in some gentler manner. I come now to the republic. I have on many occasions experienced your prudence in political matters; but nothing was ever more prudent than the observation contained in your last letter. "For though at present this boy nobly resists Antonius, yet we must wait for the issue hereafter."<sup>7</sup> Yet what an harangue? For it has been sent to me. He swears "by the hope of attaining his father's honours"; and at the same time extends his hand towards the statue<sup>a</sup>. But let me not owe my safety to one like him<sup>b</sup>. As you say, however, the surest test will be the tribunate of our friend Casca<sup>c</sup>; about which I told Oppius, when he was exhorting me to support the young man, and his whole cause, and band of veteran soldiers, that I could by no means do it, till I should be satisfied that he would not only not be an enemy to the tyrannicides, but would even be a friend to them. Upon his assurance that he would be so, why, said I, should we be in a hurry? For I can be of no use to him before the 1st of January<sup>d</sup>; and we shall see his intentions before the middle of December in the case of Casca. He readily assented. So much, then, for this. I have only to add, that you shall have messengers every day; and I imagine you will every day also have something to tell me. I send you a copy of Lepta's letter, by which that Stratyllax<sup>e</sup> appears to me crest-fallen. But you will read it, and judge for yourself.

After I had sealed my letter, I received yours and Sextus's<sup>f</sup>. Nothing could be more agreeable or more friendly than Sextus's letter. For yours was very short, having written so fully before. It is indeed with prudence and kindness that you advise me to remain in this neighbourhood, till I hear the event of the present commotions. But, my Atticus, the republic does not at this time affect me. Not that anything is or ought to be dearer to me; but even Hippocrates forbids giving medicine when all hope is past. Therefore I lay aside such considerations. It is for my private affairs that I am now concerned. Say I so? Yes, for my reputation. For though there is so great a balance, yet I have not actually received enough to pay Terentia<sup>g</sup>. Terentia do I say? You know that some time ago I engaged to pay twenty-five sestertia (200*l.*) on the part of Montanus<sup>h</sup>. Cicero had very modestly requested this on his own faith. I promised with all readiness, which you also approved, and desired Eros to set apart a sum for that purpose. He has not only not done it, but Aurelius<sup>i</sup> has been under the necessity of borrowing at a most exorbitant interest. Respecting the debt to Terentia, Tiro wrote me word that you said the money would accrue from Dolabella. I suppose he understood wrong, if anybody understands wrong; rather, he did not understand at all. For you sent me Cocceius's<sup>j</sup> answer, as Eros did, almost in the same words. I must therefore come up into the very flame of civil commotion. For it is better to fall publicly than privately. To the other subjects, upon which you so sweetly write to me, in my present disturbed state of mind I am unable to reply as I used to do. Let me first extricate myself from this care which presses me. Some means of doing this occur to me; but I can come to no certain determination till I have seen you. But why cannot I be in Rome with as much propriety as Marcellus? This, however, is not the question, nor do I much care about it. You see what it is that I care about; and I shall accordingly go up.

<sup>f</sup> Various conjectures have been formed upon the meaning of this word. It seems to be most probable that it may have been the name of some character in a play, as we see it in the "Truculentus" of Plautus. Antonius is on all hands supposed to be the person intended by it.

LETTER XVII.

(Græc. xvi.)

I HAVE read your very agreeable letter; and send you a copy of what I have written to Plancus. I shall know from Tiro what passed between them. You will be able to give more attention to your sister when you cease to be occupied with this affair<sup>k</sup>.

Presently after the conclusion of the above correspondence Cicero went up to Rome, where he used every exertion to rouse the people, the senate, the provincial governors, to support the cause of the republic. Octavius at first joined the republican armies against Antonius; but afterwards uniting with Antonius and Lepidus, formed that triumvirate, which extinguished the dying liberties of Rome. Having secured the military by promises, they proceeded to act without control, and to proscribe all who were offensive to them. Among these was Cicero, who was at that time at Tusculanum; but thereupon he fled to Astura, and embarking there went along the coast to Formianum. Thence he was going again towards the shore to re-embark, when he was overtaken and killed, having ordered his servants to make no resistance. This happened twelve months after he had come up to Rome, when he had nearly completed his 64th year.

<sup>k</sup> The affair of the Buthrotians. There is reason to believe this short letter is misplaced in point of time; and that it, with those which are thrown together in the Appendix, belongs to the same period as the others contained in book xv. and beginning of book xvi. relative to Buthrotum.

APPENDIX.

LETTER I.

M. Cicero to L. Plancus, Prator elect.

I know the great regard you bear to my friend Cæsar, and to me your zeal is such, that in truth I consider myself to have few equally attentive and affectionate. For to the great, and long, and just friendship between our families, a great accession has been made by your disposition towards me, mine towards you, equal and mutual. The case of Buthrotum is not unknown to you; for I often conversed with you about it, and detailed the whole affair to you. It happened in this manner:—As soon as we found that the Buthrotian land was proscribed, Atticus became alarmed, drew up a statement, which he gave me to present to Cæsar; for I was to dine with him that day.

I gave Cæsar the statement; and he approved the cause, and wrote back to Atticus, that he asked was very just; but at the same time reminded him, that the Buthrotians must pay the remainder of the money at the time appointed. I, who was anxious to save the city, paid the money out of his own property. Upon this we went to Cæsar, and spoke in behalf of the Buthrotians and brought back a most liberal decree, passed by persons of the first distinction. After this had been done, I confess I was surprised that Cæsar should permit the assembling of those who had fled for the Buthrotian land; and should not permit it, but should appoint you to superintend that business. Accordingly I spoke to him, but repeatedly, so that he even accused me of loss of confidence in his word. He likewise bid Messala, and Atticus himself, lay aside all pretensions; and openly declared, that he was willing to offend the minds of the claimants, if they remained in Italy; (for, as you know, he had lost popularity); but that, when they had crossed the sea, he would take care they should be settled in some other place. This passed during his life: After the death of Cæsar, as soon as the consuls decreed of the senate began to hear causes, which I have above written, was laid before them.

They approved the cause without any hesitation, and said they would write to you. But I, Plancus, though I do not doubt but the decree of the senate, and the law, and the decree of the consuls, and their letter, will have abundant authority with you, and am conscious that for Atticus's sake you would wish it; yet in consideration of our acquaintance and mutual regard, I have taken me to request that of you, which your distinguished kindness and gentle disposition would of itself induce you to grant, that what I am entreat you would do of your own accord, you will for my honour's sake do readily, liberally, and quickly. There is nobody more friendly, or more agreeable, or dearer to me, than Atticus. Before, his property only was concerned, though that was to a large amount; now his reputation is likewise implicated; that what he gained by great solicitation and favour, both in the lifetime and after the death of Cæsar, he may effectually obtain by your assistance. Should this be granted by you, I would have you believe that I shall entertain such a sense of your kindness, as to consider myself under the greatest obligation. I shall make it a point to attend with zeal and diligence to whatever I think will please or interest you. Take care to preserve your health.

LETTER II.

Cicero to Plancus, Prator elect.

I HAVE already petitioned you by letter in behalf of the Buthrotians; that, as their cause had been approved by the consuls, (who had legal authority to inquire, determine, and pass judgment on Cæsar's acts,) you would promote that object, and would relieve my Atticus (for whom I know your regard,) and me, (who am not less earnest), from our present anxiety. For everything being at length arranged, after great care, and much exertion and trouble, it remains with you to enable us as soon as possible to put an end to our solicitude. And indeed I know your prudence to be such, that you must see what great confusion will arise, if those consular decrees, which have been made respecting Cæsar's acts, are not observed. On my part, though I disapprove many of Cæsar's decisions, (which was unavoidable among such a multiplicity of business), yet for peace and quiet's sake I think it right to support them; and I believe that you strenuously maintain the same opinion. But the purpose of my letter is not to persuade, but to ask. I ask you therefore, my Plancus, and beg you, with all the zeal and ardour of which I am capable, so to undertake, so to manage, so to conclude this whole affair, that what we have without any hesitation obtained from the consuls by the extreme goodness and justness of the cause, you will not only permit us to enjoy, but will take pleasure in it, considering the disposition you have often evinced towards Atticus, both in his presence and in mine. By so doing you will confer the greatest obligation on me, who have always been united to you both by inclination and family connexion. That you will do this, I ardently request of you again and again.

LETTER III.

I NEVER expected to come before you as a suppliant; but am not sorry that an opportunity is offered me of making trial of your affection. You know my regard for Atticus. I beg you therefore to grant me this; forget, for my sake, the part he once took in behalf of a friend, your adversary, when his character was at stake. In the first place, it is becoming your humanity to pardon this; for everybody is bound to support his friends: then, if you love me (to say nothing of Atticus), grant this wholly to your Cicero, for whom you profess so much esteem; that what I have always believed, I may now fully know, the reality of your affection. After Cæsar by his decree (which I, with many persons of the first dignity, countersigned) had exempted the Buthrotians, and assured me that as soon as the claimants had crossed the sea he would write to assign them some other lands, it happened that he was suddenly cut off. Upon this, as you know, (for you were present when the consuls were appointed by a decree of the senate to take Cæsar's acts into consideration,) the business was put off to the 1st of June. The decree of the senate was confirmed by a law passed on the 2d of June, giving to the consuls the cognizance of those matters, which Cæsar had purposed, decreed, and enacted. The cause of the Buthrotians was laid before the consuls. Cæsar's decree was recited, and besides, several documents of Cæsar's were produced. The consuls by the judgment of their council decreed in favour of the Buthrotians, and appointed Plancus to carry it into execution. Now, my Capito (for I know the influence you possess wherever you are, especially with a man of Plancus's easiness and humanity,) strive, labour, or rather coax and persuade Plancus, who, I hope, is well disposed, to be still better disposed through your means. Indeed it seems to be a thing of such a kind, that without favour to anybody, Plancus would of himself, agreeably to his own disposition and prudence, not hesitate to maintain the decree of the consuls, to whom the inquiry and determination was referred both by the law and by the decree of the senate: especially as, if this sort of cognizance were invalidated, the acts of Cæsar would seem to be called in question; which not only those who are interested, but also those who disapprove them wish, for tranquillity's sake, to confirm. Nevertheless, it is of consequence to me that Plancus should do this cheerfully and freely, which he certainly will if you exert that gentle spirit which I have often experienced, and that sweetness, in which nobody equals you. I earnestly request you to do so.

LETTER IV.

Cicero to C. Cuperennius.

I HAD a great esteem for your father, and he always showed me extraordinary attention and kindness: nor indeed have I ever doubted of your affection towards me. I, on my part, have not been deficient in cultivating it. I therefore request of you the more urgently to aid the city of Buthrotum, and to exert your influence that our friend Plancus may lose no time in confirming and carrying into effect the decree of the consuls, which they made in favour of the Buthrotians, agreeably to the authority given them both by the law and by the decree of the senate. This, my Cuperennius, I earnestly request of you again and again.

LETTER V.

Cicero to Plancus, Prætor elect.

Excuse me, if after I have written to you in detail about the Buthrotians, I address you again upon the same subject. It is not, my Plancus, that I have any distrust either of your liberality, or of the friendship between us; but in an affair of such moment to my Atticus, (in which now even his reputation is concerned, that it may be seen he is able to secure that to which Cæsar consented, and which we, who were present at the decrees and rescripts of Cæsar, witnessed and countersigned,—especially as the whole power of execution rests with you;) that, what the consuls decreed agreeably to the decrees and rescripts of Cæsar, I say not, you should execute, but should execute with zeal and readiness; this will be so grateful to me, that nothing can be more so. Though I hope that by the time you receive this the request I had made in a former letter may be already granted, yet I shall not cease to importune you, till I hear that it is done; to which I look forward with great hope. Then I trust I shall write in a different strain, and shall have to return you thanks for your important favour. Should this be conferred, I would have you believe not so much that Atticus, (who is deeply interested), as that I (who am not less earnest than he) shall be obliged by it. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

Cicero to Capito.

I DOUBT not you will be surprised, and even displeased, that I should address you again upon the same subject; but an affair is at issue of great moment to Atticus, my intimate friend, to whom I am bound by every tie. I know your zeal for your friends, and theirs too for you, and it is in your power to render me essential service with Plancus. I am well acquainted with your kindness, and know the influence you have with your friends. Nobody can do us more service, on this occasion, than you. And the cause is as good as one ought to be which the consuls have decreed on the judgment of the council, having taken cognizance of it agreeably to the law and the decree of the senate. But I consider everything to rest in the liberality of your friend Plancus; who I think, while for your friendship's sake, and for the republic's sake, he will carry into effect the decree of the consuls, so for my sake will be glad to do it. Assist me then, my Capito; for which again and again I earnestly entreat you. Farewell.
